TOPEKA — Traffic slowed and heads turned to hear the chanting and see the signs that read, "WARNING WE VOTE," "GOVERNMENT SENSE IS NONSENSE," and "I'M TOO POOR TO VOTE REPUBLICAN," as the 1,000 Woman March rallied around the Statehouse.

Informal speakers gathered on the steps of the Statehouse to take turns telling their stories at the open microphone.

"This march is meant to be an empowering experience, helping to educate those who make decisions that affect us," Brenda Hanger, chairwoman of the event, said. "As social workers, we must continue to advocate for those who are most at risk of becoming invisible."

Some spoke of the contributions they have been able to make to society now as a result of welfare assistance in the past, and others spoke of how welfare reform will disrupt their lives and the lives of their children.

The speakers included Ashley Risher, a 12-year-old foster child who met with Hillary Clinton to represent the 500,000 children who spend their childhoods on a waiting list for a family.

"Every month that my file sits on a stranger's desk, I get older," Risher said. "I have spent half of my life waiting for someone to tell me what I'm going to do with the rest of it."

Jonathon Hammond, 16, and Luke Fender, 17, residents at the Lawrence Achievement Place for Boys, spoke about their experiences living in limbo.

Within three years in state custody, Hammond said he has been through 20 placements, just long enough to get settled and have to move again.

"The changes they pass don't affect the people making them. They affect me," Fender said.

Many women spoke about their struggles to maintain families on minimum-wage jobs. In many cases, the speakers were mothers who had left their spouses to get out of abusive relationships, including Mercy Conrad, a social work student at Wichita State University.

Grant to be used for 2 new courses in engineering

Laurel Novell
staff reporter

New technology has forced K-State's teaching methods to change. It has forced students' studying methods to change. It has even forced the subjects taught to change.

K-State will begin offering two research-based electrical engineering courses funded by the National Science Foundation.

K-State, the University of Missouri-Rolla and the University of Arkansas have been awarded a $400,000 grant by NSF.

The grant will be used to develop two courses in power engineering.

Flexible Control of Distribution Systems will be taught by Anil Pahwa, professor in electrical and computer engineering, in fall 1996. The second course, Flexible Control of Transmission Systems, will be taught by Shelli Starrett, assistant professor of electrical and computer engineering, in spring 1997.

"If it were not possible to exchange information between universities on a timely basis, then it would be extremely hard. The idea itself wouldn't have come to mind. If the technology didn't exist, we wouldn't have these classes," Pahwa said.

► EBONY FASHION REVUE

Show showcases diversity

Rhonda A. Lee
staff reporter

Saturday night's Ebony Fashion Revue was the final event for this year's Free Your Mind Week sponsored by the Union Program Council's Multicultural Committee.

The evening began with the singing of the Black National Anthem, "Lift Every Voice and Sing."

About 150 people were in attendance to watch 40 K-State students model African, casual, evening, formal and African American sorority and fraternity greek fashions provided by local merchants.

Nicole Lopez, sophomore in electrical engineering, said the Ebony Fashion Revue was an enjoyable evening of culture and provided her with a good learning experience.

Lopez said she also appreciated the diversity displayed among the African American students.

"As each person walked, they had their own style. They had their own poise. They showed how they were. And I guess the way I feel it's important is that they were all an individual," Lopez said.

Chauna Agosto, senior in marketing, agreed the diversity the Ebony Fashion Revue offered was important to the show and the campus.

"The fashion show also had African wear. I think that it gave people the opportunity to see the

AIDS quilt symbolizes lost lives

TOPEKA — You are standing in a stadium of ghosts.

The hypnotic monotony of the body count reads on and on, soberly listing one name after another, with a haunting factuality.

Wedding rings, Legos, crucifixes, love letters, condoms and Christmas ornaments decorate the largest quilt in the world, a nomadic cemetery undivided by race, nationality, gender or religion.

The NAMES Project AIDS

Memorial Quilt represents 11 percent of the total casualties of AIDS from 39 nations, each representing one or more lives lost to this indiscriminate disease.

The Topeka display included 1,920 panels, one-tenth of the 30,000 total panels that have been added to the quilt since the project began in San Francisco in 1987, said Jane Redger, volunteer from the Topeka AIDS Project, who lost her brother to the disease.

"The thing that's the worst is that most of these people are young," she said. "They would've been in the prime of their lives."

Since NAMES began, it has been the most effective resource in educating people, including 200,000 students a year, about the risk of AIDS.

The display provides access to statistics and information about the disease that students might find shocking, such as the fact that AIDS is now the leading cause of death among people age 25-44, and one-

► GOV. BILL GRAVES APPOINTS 2 MEMBERS TO BOARD OF REGENTS

Gov. Bill Graves announced the appointment of two new members to the Kansas Board of Regents Thursday.

"The governor interviewed a number of people for the position," Mike Matson, communications director at the state capitol, said. "He was looking for people dedicated to higher education with a commitment to the state."

Murray Lull, president of Smith County State Bank and Trust Company of Smith Center, and Sylvia Robinson, manager and program officer of the Ewing Marion Kauffman Foundation in Kansas City, were selected by Graves to fill the vacancies.

"Robinson has been involved in higher and lower education, and Lull is a banker. The criteria basically fit these two," Matson said.

Lull and Robinson both have children at K-State.

Lull's children are Andrew Lull, senior in mechanical engineering, and Melissa Lull, freshman in business administration.

Robinson also has two children. Her oldest is Roy Robinson, freshman in milling science and management. Her daughter is in high school.

Robinson graduated with a bachelor's degree in elementary education from K-State and received her master's degree and doctorate in special education/educational psychology and research at the University of Kansas.

Since 1983, Robinson has been a member of the Kansas City, Kan., School Board.

This is not the first appointment from the governor for Lull.

In 1995, Lull was appointed to the Tax Equity Task Force.

► BALANCED BUDGET WAR MIGHT LEAD TO S&L CRISIS IF UNRESOLVED

WASHINGTON (AP) — A little-known aftershock of the balanced budget battle was the unraveling of a fragile compromise to patch up another mess left over from the savings and loan crisis.

Failure to resolve a problem with the Savings Association Insurance Fund could lead to a crisis in a fund that insures $459 billion in S&L deposits.

Also at stake is the possible default of $8 billion in government bonds issued to clean up part of the S&L mess, Treasury Department and Federal Deposit Insurance Corp. officials say.

The Clinton administration and the GOP-led Congress agree the fund needs to be fixed, so there is little likelihood S&L depositors will lose any money, analysts say.

But the agreement has not translated into legislative action this year, which is making the S&L industry nervous.

A plan to rescue the fund, known as SAIF, seemed to be a sure thing last year.

Thrifts agreed to a one-time payment of $6 billion to fully finance the insurance fund, while banks would help S&Ls share in the annual $780-million interest payments on FICO bonds, issued by the Financing Corporation to pay for part of the S&L cleanup.

The deal was included in the 1995 balanced budget bill, partially immunizing it from powerful opposition of bankers who were upset at being stuck with a $12 billion "tax" over the next 23 years by sharing in the FICO payments.

The deal began to crumble last November when Clinton vetoed the balanced budget package, which led to government shutdowns.

Since then, bankers have been lobbying hard against the FICO payments, arguing there is not a SAIF crisis and saying the thrift industry can afford to bail out the fund itself, since it earned $5.4 billion last year.

► CLINTON TO DETAIL TAX CUTS

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Clinton fleshes out a $1.64 trillion budget for 1997 on Tuesday with a plan for girding America's economy that he hopes will underpin his re-election bid against likely Republican nominee Bob Dole.

Hewing to an outline he introduced six weeks ago to meet a legal deadline, Clinton will detail his recipe of tax cuts for families, savings from Medicare and other benefit programs, plus increases for education, the environment and high technology. The final product: a political document that he will argue charts the best path for raising Americans' living standards by balancing the budget by 2002 and bolstering key programs.

One administration official said White House concern over economic security was unrelated to the "boomlet of interest" the issue received during the GOP presidential nomination fight. In fact, in his fiscal 1996 budget 13 months ago, Clinton discussed the problems of falling incomes, low job creation rates and stagnant living standards — all on the first page.

► RARE MENINGITIS KILLS 2

JOPLIN, Mo. (AP) — A middle-aged woman. A 2-year-old boy. They were not neighbors. They had no mutual acquaintances and no physical contact.

They had one thing in common, and it killed them.

Both died of a rare strain of bacterial meningitis that has been detected six times in three counties in southwestern Missouri — and nowhere else in the country.

The strain that caused the epidemic is deemed so unusual that the Center for Disease Control and Prevention in Atlanta is sending a federal researcher to begin an in-depth study Monday.

"This is a strain that we haven't detected as being associated with clusters of illness," said Dr. Bradley Perkins of the CDC.

The four people who survived the illness — three grade school-age children and one young adult — have no obvious links to each other or to the two victims who died, but the CDC hopes to learn more about risk factors by interviewing them and their families.

Open spaces provide peace of mind

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

The lawn east of Anderson Hall is one of the handful of large, open space on campus.

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

As spring approaches and nature comes back to life, the K-State community begins to spend more time outside.

Like most universities, K-State has a campus environment of both buildings and green spaces. These green spaces are our environment's public outreach utensil.

K-State's true open space is divided into various clusters: east of Anderson Hall, the quad between McCain Auditorium and Calvin Hall, the quad between Waters Hall and Farrell Library and bordering the central campus path between the K-State Student Union and Cardwell Hall.

Tim Keane, professor of landscape architecture, said the condition of open space at K-State is broken and lacks coherency.

"If people can discern the different spaces and follow a coherent pattern, people will be drawn to the spaces," Keane said.

"Intuitively, people realize the benefit of open space, but most people would find that hard to articulate," he said. "It's extremely important to our psychological and physical function."

Professor Emil Fischer, in his 1975 book "Kansas State University: A Walk Through Campus," wrote, "If a well articulated arrangement of buildings is connected by an interesting and functional road and path circulation, defined by a judicious arrangement of plant forms, students and visitors will enjoy the delightful experience of a walk through the campus."

However, present campus planning is bound by the building mistakes of the past.

As University landscape architect, Mark Taussig works within the confines of past planning and building — both good and bad.

Taussig said the outdoors is the meeting between the colleges.

"We're all together here, and the outdoor spaces are where everyone can come together to interact, if not literally, at least conceptually," he said. "It's where our paths cross."

"Green spaces are a sign of life: It's growing, it provides oxygen, and it cools us in the summertime," Taussig said.

During the 10 years Taussig has been with the University, he has helped to identify, along with other concerned people, open spaces which need protection.

Taussig said the open spaces east of Anderson are critical spaces.

"If we developed that space, the campus would be much more urban," he said.

This space is not always the most usable, or used, space on campus. Most is occupied by the president's residence. It is also far removed from the central campus core which the vast majority of K-State residents use.

The great lawn in front of Anderson is roped off — which gives it a feeling of "look, but don't touch." Shaded open space of this sort is practically nonexistent on the west and north sides of campus. This concrete condition is mainly due to the bulking of buildings and parking facilities that continue to be concentrated in these areas.

Space series

This is the first in a series of five articles concerning and evaluating different concepts of space on the K-State campus which will appear daily this week. Russell Fortmeyer is a junior in architectural engineering and an observer of campus planning, design and history.

As the campus expands, open space contracts.

Taussig said the new engineering library planned for the east facade of Durland Hall could have been built underground in order to preserve the open pedestrian plaza.

"I'm not happy about that, but they didn't ask me," he said.

Taussig said he and others are trying to preserve a perimeter campus green belt of 100 feet bordering Manhattan, Anderson and Denison avenues.

Durland's phase three, planned for the west, and Ackert's addition, planned for the east, will eat up the last remaining grassy expanses on the west except for Memorial Stadium.

Taussig said the plan for a parking garage in the stadium has not been completely ruled out.

"It's probably the best site for the garage," he said.

Keane said the play areas in Memorial Stadium are important from a recreational standpoint.

"They're certainly not park-like settings, but that's not their purpose," he said.

History has not been kind to K-State's appearance since its founding as an agricultural college in 1863. What started as a vast, practically treeless, expanse of fields and prairie is, in some places, a jarring, jumbled mass of buildings and parking lots.

A 1968 campus planning study, researched as a project by a Design V architecture class, reached the same conclusions planners do today.

The members of the class wrote that "little relationship exists at this moment between the open and enclosed spaces. There is no unifying element that ties in the campus through the use of open spaces, trees and enclosed spaces ... outdoor spaces which could be conducive to socializing and resting do not exist."

The condition of the campus is by no means final. K-State is an ever-changing organism.

Keane said he believes there is enormous potential at K-State for reclaiming lost spaces.

"The Quinlan Natural Area is a nice place, but it's not a natural area," he said. "There are many exotic introduced plants there."

"Something that really bothers me is you can walk around campus, and you wouldn't really know you were in the Flint Hills," he said. "It looks much like any other campus in the Midwest."

"There are very few places on campus you can even see the Flint Hills from the ground. You lose a very important connection to the region."

Keane said the planned University Gardens Project, to be built south of the College of Veterinary Medicine campus, will be a nice addition to K-State. He said it will not be so much a naturalistic garden as it will be an arboretum.

FOREIGN POLICY SPEAKER

Darren Whitley
staff reporter

Speaker calls for change in foreign policy

The collapse of the Soviet Union has left the United States government confused and looking for an enemy, a foreign policy expert told audience members Friday.

"We have a hard time finding enemies out there in the world," said Howard Wiarda, guest Union Program Council Issues and Ideas lecturer from the National War College and on leave from the University of Massachusetts at Amherst.

This has foreign policy makers in Washington distraught because they do not know what to do, Wiarda said.

The difference is U.S. foreign policy must change to appropriately address the needs of the U.S. and Latin America.

Russia has so many problems internally that they have almost no interest in Latin America.

This means that Latin American nations can no longer play the "Third World Game," Wiarda said.

During the Cold War, Latin American nations used the communistic threat as a means of securing American investment, subsidization and military aid.

"We are discovering that Latin American problems of poverty and inequality tend to become American problems of poverty and inequality through massive migration," Wiarda said.

If Mexico were to destabilize either politically or economically, it could prove devastating with a massive migration to the United States, Wiarda said.

The United States should establish strong trade ties with the newly industrialized countries because they will be important to the global economy, Wiarda said.

"We do need to move forward with Latin American and help them out," Amanda Mackey, senior in Spanish, said.

The industrialization of Latin America is evident in the changes in education and shift away from agriculture in Latin America.

"I like the idea that we would concentrate more on trading with Latin America than with other countries," said Jill Sink, senior in political science and Latin American studies.

Wiarda said when he began traveling to Latin America in the 1960s, 70 percent of the people were illiterate.

Now, only 20 percent of the Latin American population is illiterate. Then it was 70 percent rural, and now it is 70 percent urban.

"The proverbial threat that existed to the U.S. during the cold war has disappeared. There is no threat anywhere in Latin America," Wiarda said.

The difficulty for foreign policy makers in Washington is owing up to the reality that the Cold War has ended in Latin America, Wiarda said.

"Virtually every form of policy assumption that my generation grew up with during the period of the Cold War now needs to be rethought," Wiarda said.

Mackey said she could relate to a lot of what Wiarda said from her own personal experience.

"I thought it was really interesting how he feels we are going to move forward in Latin America and the way in which we are going to move," Mackey said.

The United States has more commercial ties with Brazil than with China.

Trade among the United States, Brazil and Mexico is also larger than between the United States and China, Wiarda said.

Latin America makes a natural trading partner, Wiarda said.

U.S.-Latin American foreign policy was first established by the Monroe Doctrine in 1823. U.S.-Latin American foreign policy has been almost unchanged since then, Wiarda said.

Wiarda said U.S.-Latin American foreign policy needs to change so it is not so reactive to crisis because a lot has changed since it was first established.

Students should file to run for offices

QUICK read

Students interested in running in student elections need to file by 4 p.m. today in the Office of Student Activities and Services, located on the first floor of the K-State Student Union.

It is easy for students to sit back and criticize Student Senate.

But today, instead of criticizing, students should step up to the plate and run for Senate themselves.

The filing deadline for the Student Governing Association election is 4 p.m. today. If you want to run for student body president or vice president, Student Senate, the Board of Student Publications, Union Governing Board, the Fine Arts Committee or college councils, you have to file with SGA.

You do not necessarily need a working knowledge of all the ins and outs of these offices. All you really need is a desire to better K-State.

Candidates have to be full-time students for fee purposes, which is enrollment in seven or more credit hours. Graduate students must be enrolled in six or more hours.

The filing process is relatively easy. Filing forms are available in the Office of Student Activities and Services on the first floor of the K-State Student Union, and the completed application can be returned to the same office. Fill it out, attend a mandatory meeting, and you are on your way.

The real job is representing the student body after being elected.

Senate has control over student fees and allocations to student organizations and entities like Student Publications Inc., the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and Lafene Health Center.

Sure, you might miss Thursday night television, but sometimes the show inside Senate is better.

We need a diverse, philosophical thought process to represent our campus. Apply for an office and make a difference.

The facts speak for themselves

I received a great deal of response to my column "about" gun control ("Thanks to the dork who shot me," March 4).

The responses came in two distinct types. The first type of response came from people (both greek and non-greek) who thought my column was about the fraternity involved in the shooting.

I have reread my column, and I really think people who think it was about that fraternity are way too involved in the greek community, so much so they let it dominate their vision. This column is not about that fraternity, either.

The other type of response came from people who objected to my stance on gun control. These responses were, almost entirely, very rational requests for the sources and the numbers of the statistics I alluded to.

It is a rare thing for me to receive thoughtful, reasonable responses to my columns, and so these letters prompted me to make a much more thoughtful, reasonable attempt at articulating my position.

The following information came from the Centers for Disease Control, the FBI, the BATF, the Coalition to Stop Handgun Violence, the Gun Control Resource Center and the National Rifle Association.

Here are some of the statistics I found to be most provocative:

■ In 1990, handguns were used to murder 22 people in Great Britain, 68 in Canada, 87 in Japan, and 11,719 in the United States.

■ Americans are 15 times more likely to be killed by gunfire than Europeans.

■ Handgun violence is on the rise. While the nation's murder rate increased 18 percent in the last six years, the handgun murder rate increased by 50 percent.

■ Handguns are responsible for 80 percent of all firearm homicides but comprise only one-third of all firearms.

■ In 1991, firearm injuries were responsible for more deaths to U.S. teen-agers than all natural diseases combined.

Many of the people who wrote letters to me personally or to the opinion page offered various anecdotes about how a private citizen's handgun stopped this or that crime.

The problem is that for every anecdote like that, there are several anecdotes about how some innocent person was killed by a handgun.

The fact is a gun kept in the home is 43 times more likely to kill a friend or family than an intruder.

Our nation has not addressed the handgun issue very rationally, for a variety of reasons. Just imagine what would happen if we looked at handguns in the same way that we look at, say, microwaves or aspirin:

According to the NRA, only one out of every 100 firearms purchased lawfully from licensed dealers are ever involved in a human gunshot wound.

If one out of every 100 microwaves caused injury, those microwaves would be recalled. If one out of every 100 bottles of Tylenol caused injury, Tylenol would be sued to bankruptcy.

Guns are the second-leading cause of death in males age 14 to 28, second only to automobiles. Unlike cars, most Americans get along just fine without guns.

But we do not think of guns that way. We do not even get upset about the economic cost of handguns. Eighty-five percent of the estimated $14.4 billion spent to treat gunshot wounds is paid by taxpayers.

The opponents of a ban on handguns often mention the Second Amendment. I am a true believer in the Bill of Rights, but I think this is an abuse of it.

I think privately owned handguns should be illegal for generally the same reason laser-guided bombs and mobile artillery launchers are illegal.

Handguns kill a lot more innocent people than shotguns and rifles. I think from an economic and social standpoint, it would be very wise to leave handguns, along with many other weapons, to the people who are actually in a well-regulated militia, like the United States Air Force, Army and Navy.

Let the rest of us be content with our shotguns.

► ATTEMPT AT SATIRE FAILS MISERABLY

Editor,

I am writing in response to Jason Hamilton's column, "A solution to K-State's problems."

Jonathan Swift would be embarrassed by Hamilton's writing. His attempt at writing satirically failed. Swift based his writing on the assumption that his proposal was impossible. Making a school the size of K-State a private institution is possible.

The University of Southern California, the University of Notre Dame, Boston College, Bethany College, Friends University, Tabor College and Sterling College are all successful private institutions around the country and in the state of Kansas, just to name a few.

Sure, the tuition is higher at these institutions than at most state-funded schools, but I doubt many who have received a degree from these institutions are overly concerned with that.

Graduates of these schools and many others across the nation probably have well-paying jobs to pay off their school bills. According to Hamilton's attitude, all these schools should be broke, oppressive, cruel and unhappy.

Hamilton fails to see the benefits of private institutions and at the same time fails to recognize the follies of public schools.

I would ask Hamilton this:

Why did my computer have to dial 37 times to gain access to the Internet last week and 14 times tonight just to write this letter? Answer: There is no charge for over-use or abuse.

People recognize and take advantage of free services at public institutions, but what happens when services such as the Internet access is overloaded?

Charge a fee. I will gladly pay a fee for that service. That idea comes from free-market theory (scary, huh?).

Private institutions have used ideas like this and made them work (scary, huh?).

Basically, consumers must use discretion in a world of limited resources.

I hope people at K-State follow this example. An old saying applies to this issue: "You get what you pay for."

A box that contains my life

My mother sent a box of crap to me last weekend from Lee's Summit, Mo. There is really no other way to describe it. I bet your mom will some day send you a similar box of crap.

Your parents have it somewhere in their house, the basement or the back of a closet. Someday when your parents move or just feel you are old enough to have it, you will get it.

This box contains all the material evidence of your school years. There are cards you made for Mother's Day, class photographs, field-day ribbons, campaign buttons from student council elections and valentines from sweethearts long forgotten. My box has all that stuff and more.

It occurred to me the stuff in this box is a better record of my school experience than any yearbook could ever be. It is a personal history of events I participated in and people who were important to me.

It is depressing to me that all the significant memorabilia from 13 years of my life fits into a cardboard box that would barely hold all of my books from this semester. I hope the next 13 years produces a U-Haul full of stuff.

It is puzzling to me that my mother's interest in me seems to diminish through the years; there are tons of samples of my work in first grade and very little from high school. Maybe it was my interest in sharing my work with her that changed — that and the fact you do not make many paper-maché art projects in the 11th grade.

My first-grade class photo is of our class in front of the biggest American flag I have ever seen. You can tell it was the fall of 1976. I was cute then. We all were cute then. None of us had learned to make bunny ears behind the person in front of us or give the photographer the bird. All of those children are in their mid-20s now. I wonder where they are and if we would be able to stand together in front of that flag now.

I actually have contact with some of the people in my sixth-grade class photo or at least know what happened to them through high school. A student body president, three drop-outs, a drug dealer and two teen-age moms are in this sea of innocent 11- and 12-year-old faces.

Stuffed between report cards and a program from my high school's production of the musical "Annie" are letters from my first true love. Folded in some twisted form of origami, he writes of undying love and his plans for the future. All of his plans for the future came true — he wanted to be valedictorian of our class and go to Massachusetts Institute of Technology. He did both. As for his undying love, well, from high school love bloomed life-long friendship. We e-mail each other once a week or so, and he reads my column on the Electronic Collegian.

The high school years in this book are filled with the certificates of achievements I worked diligently to get, certificates that meant so much to me then. They are meaningless pieces of pretty paper now.

Of course any book that chronicles 13 years of American culture, especially if it contains the late 1970s, is a trip through fashion hell. From moon boots to parachute pants and Izod shirts, my life has been a reflection of bad fads. Being from a lower middle-class family, I was usually one fad behind and wearing cheap imitations.

After spending three hours sorting through this collection of crap, I have made the box smaller. I threw out pictures of people I could not remember and papers I did not feel were important anymore. I figure if I clean it out every 10 years, by the time I am 50 years old all of it will fit into an envelope.

Poor shooting shatters Cats' NCAA hopes

RICHMOND, VA. — Twenty-one points separated K-State and New Mexico after the first-round game of the NCAA Tournament.

It was those 21 points that sent the Wildcats back to Manhattan as the Lobos stunned the Cats, 69-48.

"They're a great team, but they're not 20 points better than us," senior Tyrone Davis said. Davis finished the game 3-of-10 from the field, with seven points. He led the Cats in rebounding with eight.

Coach Tom Asbury said the key to K-State's loss was its poor shooting. K-State shot only 28.8 percent from the field as opposed to New Mexico's 41 percent.

"We didn't play very well offensively in this game and particularly in the last 10 minutes," Asbury said. "We stunk offensively in the last 10 minutes, and I think that carried over and affected us defensively."

In the final 13:26 of the game, the Cats made only one field goal, courtesy of a three-pointer by senior Elliot Hatcher. The Cats' 4-of-10 shooting from the free throw line only kept them further away from New Mexico.

Hatcher paced the Cats with 14 points on 2-of-14 from the field. His only buckets came from behind the arc and at the charity stripe. Hatcher went to the line 10 times and missed only twice.

"We had a lot of great shots, but we weren't getting the ball in the basket," Asbury said.

Davis said he felt K-State just gave up.

"We played hard for 30 minutes, but it seemed like we gave up. We didn't get tired. We just didn't play well," he said.

Also key to the Cats' loss was the absence of reserve Shawn Rhodes.

Rhodes had been admitted to the hospital for flu symptoms, but doctors suspected appendicitis. The hospital refused to release Rhodes for the game, and the Cats were notified only minutes before tip-off.

Hatcher said he felt Rhodes' absence was a factor in the game.

"It was a big factor," he said. "Shawn either starts or comes off the bench, and he normally knocks out the open jump shots, which frees up Tyrone and Gerald down low. I think by him not being there, and I wasn't knocking down the shots, we missed him a lot."

Rhodes was instrumental in helping the Cats find their way to the Big Dance. He helped K-State defeat then-No. 23 Iowa State on the road when he scored a career-high 18 points on 7-of-14 field goals. He had three treys, including one that tied the contest with 1:40 left in regulation. Rhodes also snagged seven rebounds against the Cyclones.

He was released from the hospital before the game ended and had returned to the hotel by the time the game was over.

A highlight for the Cats was the play of freshman Manny Dies. Predicted to have an immediate effect on the Cats' inside game in the preseason, Dies had been relatively ineffective for K-State until late in the season.

Dies entered the tournament with a career-high nine points set at Washington early in the season. He tied his high against the Lobos and set a new career high of eight rebounds. His previous rebounding high had been five.

Defensively, Dies had one blocked shot and one steal for the Cats.

The Cats started the tournament off on the right foot as they scored the first six points of the game. K-State opened with a 10-2 run before the Lobos started to fight back. K-State possessed its biggest

Early in the second half, Coach Tom Asbury yells at Elliot Hatcher during a 20-second timeout. Despite coming out strong in the first half, the Cats lost momentum, dropping the game 69-48.

Quiet freshman steps up, performs during Cats' tournament time of need

RICHMOND, VA. — K-State's basketball season may have ended on a sour note, but there appears to be a merrier melody in the making for Coach Tom Asbury.

Sprung into action in the first round of the NCAA Tournament due to the illness of Shawn Rhodes, freshman Manny Dies showed K-Staters that Rhodes and Ayome May were not the only freshmen who could step up in times of need.

"I only found out 10-15 minutes before the game when we were on the bus that Shawn was sick," Dies said. "To be honest, Shawn's so quiet, I didn't even notice he wasn't there. I wasn't nervous. I never get nervous because I never know how much I'm going to play."

Twelve minutes into the game, Dies made his appearance known. On an assist by senior Elliot Hatcher, Dies thought about passing to Tyrone Davis but spun around from the left wing for a jumper. The shot was good, and with a wide grin, Dies pushed the Cats' lead to 17-14.

"I'm here to play basketball," Dies said. "The shot was there, and I took it. I just decided if this was going to be our last game, I was going to make it count."

"Manny was terrific. He did a great job. He hadn't played a lot of minutes for us this year, but he was real active out there," Asbury said. "He did a lot of things for us and really did a nice job rebounding, obviously. He played very, very well for us. He's going to be a really good player."

The Wildcats fell to New Mexico, 69-48, in Richmond, Va., and ended the 1995-96 season with a 17-12 record overall. Although the Lobos squashed K-State's hopes of facing Georgetown in the second round, Dies tied his career-high nine points against the Lobos. But Dies' presence for the Cats was felt more on the boards as Dies grabbed eight rebounds, tying with Davis as the team leaders.

Dies' eight rebounds were a career high for the freshman. His previous high was five, set twice, at Washington and Iowa State.

With the departure of Davis, Asbury will be looking to Dies to replace the power forward. Davis said he felt filling the shoes he leaves behind would be an easy task for Dies.

"It was good for Manny and good for the team," he said. "Next year, he's going to have to step up and fill my shoes. I know he can."

Although some people might feel pressure in trying to fill Davis' shoes, Dies said there will not be any pressure for him.

"Tyrone's a good player, and he's a senior. But it's just a cycle," he said. "Hopefully, one day, I'll be passing it

Cats' good start not enough to break Shockers; Cats fall 7-4

Derek Simmons
contributing writer

Wichita State looked beaten.

Here were the Shockers, smarting from a shutout to Arkansas last Wednesday, down 4-1 in the third inning to K-State.

The Wildcats had two monster hits reach the outfield wall after short bounces. The Wildcats had the bases loaded.

"We played just as poorly as I've ever seen us play at Arkansas," Wichita State coach Gene Stephenson said. "We started out that way tonight, too."

The operative phrase there is "started out." Those runners who loaded the bases for the Wildcats in the third inning never crossed home plate. No K-State base runners crossed home again.

Freshman Marc Bluma provided relief in the third inning, halting K-State's offense and helping nationally ranked Wichita State to a 7-4 win Friday at Frank Myers Field.

"You have to make the most of your opportunities," K-State coach Mike Clark said. "One of the pressures of playing Wichita State close is you know you'll see some great arms out of the bullpen."

The Cats, 12-6, split a doubleheader with Regis Saturday.

Second base was as far as K-State would advance against Wichita State after a lucrative third inning. The Shockers picked up three runs in the top of the ninth to take the win.

Scott Poepard, K-State's second baseman, said it was more like a gift.

Wichita State profited from five K-State errors, two of which led to four Shocker runs.

"We gave them a lot of help," Poepard said. "It's a game we should have won. But once again we came out on the losing end of that one. That's Wichita State."

That's Wichita State — winners of the last 12 meetings, including one- and two-run victories last year.

Poepard's error off Jerry Stine's sharp grounder in the seventh inning, taking an odd hop to Poepard's left, allowed Nathan Reese and Randy Young to score.

Casey Blake's single pushed Travis Wyckoff across, too, tying the game, 4-4.

"It's a play I should have made," Poepard said, "and those four others we should have made."

That's Wichita State.

A similar error by shortstop Heath Schesser in the ninth inning equaled two more runs for the Shockers, good enough for the win.

REVIEW

Restaging offers literal, timeless view of 'Henry V'

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

Although many people spend St. Patrick's Day celebrating in a pub, not many theatergoers expect the same sort of situation when attending Shakespeare.

Patrons of McCain Auditorium Sunday afternoon belied up to the bar for the Acting Company's touring production of Shakespeare retitled "Henry V: Crispian's Day at the Boar's Head."

The restaging of the play, by director Mary Lou Rosato, in a quasi-English pub was an interesting feat to watch and hear.

The characters assumed the roles of war veterans, barmaids and the like — each of them looking back on past conquests, old conversations and distant wars.

However, these new identities were not rooted in one particular time period and one war, but many different time periods.

There was the Confederate army soldier left over from the Civil War, an Irishman from World War I and a minuteman from the Revolution, among others.

The pub atmosphere, carefully created with a well-placed dart board, a jukebox and a mishmash of lights and junk, conjured up a feeling of nostalgia, which made the conceptual production work.

Rosato said the new staging makes the play timeless. One wonders, though, if such a literal staging, although easy to comprehend, may make this timelessness come at a price for some audience members.

Adding to the mix, and sometimes taking away, were musical interludes of songs generally associated with wars: "When Irish Eyes Are Smiling," "White Cliffs of Dover" and the requisite Glen Miller tune.

This musical overlay made the show move faster but at the price of time for contemplation and digestion of the play's dialogue.

Sometimes this staging was hard to follow, especially with the crown being passed from hand to hand as different actors took on the role of King Hal.

However, the staging did succeed in allowing new interpretation of the play and of ourselves. Watching these fading relics of past wars was nostalgic can either give one an appreciation of their efforts or create a feeling of sympathy, or even pity, for them.

One does wonder how much of the staging was lost on some of the audience.

Most of the laughs can almost be attributed to Rosato's sometimes-comic direction and not the bard's words alone.

Like most restagings and unique interpretations, there will be some members of the audience who will be disappointed and some who will rediscover the play with fervor.

Although Sunday's performance did little to disappoint, at times it left some to be desired.

Biologist's career spans 46 years

■ Jane Westfall has won many awards for her research

Brent Smith
staff reporter

Walking down a hall to her office and lab in the Veterinary Medical Science building, there are nearly 15 posters covering the walls, representing a few of the recent research projects she has worked on.

A native of Lafayette, Calif., Jan Westfall's career in biology spans almost 46 years.

It has been highlighted by a seemingly endless list of awards and recognitions most recently, the 1993 K-State Conoco Distinguished Graduate Faculty Award and the 1995 Pacific Alumni Association's Distinguished Professional Service Award.

Aside from Westfall's research, she still manages to find time to chair the University Women's Caucus.

The time there is spent helping develop scholarship opportunities for women, she said. "We try and promote scholarships for women in science," Westfall said.

Her current study investigates the basic functional morphology of nerve cells and their synaptic connections in sea anemones, which belong to the first group of animals to have recognizable nervous systems.

It is no wonder Westfall chose the sea anemones to study because the amount of time she has spent near the ocean originally sparked her interest in marine biology.

Denise Landers, a research instruments operator, has been working with Westfall on this latest research.

Westfall is involved from beginning to end, and she is extremely patient, Landers said. "When she's working, she is very fine and meticulous," Landers said.

Westfall has a bachelor's degree from the University of Pacific, a master's degree from Mills College and a doctorate in zoology from the University of California.

Also, Westfall spent a year of her education in Naples, Italy, on a Fulbright Scholarship.

Westfall spends the fall teaching Introduction to Microanatomy. But do not even think that she relaxes in the spring and summer.

"I like to go walking in the mall," she said. "I also enjoy traveling."

Westfall has visited China, Russia, Australia and Europe, just to name a few destinations.

SCOTT M. LADD/Collegian

During her nearly 46 years in biology, Jane Westfall, professor of anatomy and physiology, has garnered an endless list of awards and recognition. Recently she was awarded the 1995 Pacific Alumni Association's Distinguished Professional Service Award.

So when she is not researching, teaching, relaxing or working with the University Women's Caucus, Westfall is searching for more funds for research.

"A lot of the time is spent trying to get additional grants for research," Westfall said. So what will she do after this current research ends?

"I don't know what I'll do," she said with a smile.

K-State joins in National Call to Action Day

Marci McNeal
staff reporter

Seven campus organizations, along with several featured speakers, participated in the National Call to Action Day Friday in the free-speech zone behind the K-State Student Union.

This was the second year K-State has been involved in the national event.

"K-State prides itself especially in the fact that we're the only school in the Midwest that participated in this event," said Jason Dechant, vice president of the Young Democrats and junior in political science.

Dechant said about 300 universities participate in this event around the nation, mostly on the East and West coasts.

"We've received a lot of accolades and appreciation from these bigger schools around the nation for participating," Dechant said.

Tables were set up to inform students about issues the organizations felt were important.

The campus organizations present were Houses for Christ sponsored by Rotaract Club, Habitat for Humanity, Students for Peace and Justice, Young Democrats, Amnesty International, National Organization for Women, American Civil Liberties Union and the Student Governing Association booth to register to vote.

"Today, our goal is to lessen the apathy. It's gotten to the point where people just don't seem concerned, and any little bit that you can do helps drastically," said Maggie Keating, member of the Young Democrats and freshman in political science.

Local issues were not the only topics covered in the day's events.

"We feel it's important for students to get involved, not only with local issues but international issues as well," said Terri Harris, member of Amnesty International and senior in Spanish and Latin American studies.

Harris said on a day like the National Call to Action Day, groups can really make a personal connection with students and bring the student movement home to them.

STEVE HEBERT/Collegian

Terri Harris, senior in Spanish, speaks to the group Amnesty International during Friday's National Call to Action Day in the free-speech zone behind the K-State Student Union.

"We wanted to encourage students to get involved with their communities, and that student empowerment is really essential in making a difference in Manhattan," said Liz Ring, vice president of the ACLU and senior in history.

A petition to support financial aid and a Day of Action survey were placed at the individual tables for the students.

Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance, spoke to the crowd about critical student-aid issues.

"Here at K-State about 70 percent of the students receive some kind of assistance, either through the federal government, the state government or through K-

State itself," Moeder said.

"Congress will listen and respond to students when they call and say that they have a difficult time paying for educational expenses and are concerned about the amount of debt they're incurring during college," Moeder said.

Guy Smith, medical director at Lafene Health Center, also spoke to the crowd about services offered at Lafene and changes that are taking place.

"If we lost the services at Lafene or had fewer services available or fewer staff, many students would have difficulty getting access to a physician, certainly in a way that they are used to in the past," Smith said.

► LECTURE

Speaker to highlight sexual, racial problems

■ Speaker's career shaped by commitment toward civil rights

Laurel Howell
staff reporter

K-State alumna L. Camille Hébert, an associate professor of law at Ohio State, will discuss racial harassment and sexual harassment at 7:30 p.m. Tuesday in Forum Hall.

The lecture will focus on the effects of drawing analogies between racial harassment and sexual harassment.

The Dorothy L. Thompson Lecture Series committee selected Hébert as a speaker because of her commitment to civil rights issues.

"Her entire career has been devoted to civil rights and privacy," said Jerry Frieman, chairperson of the Dorothy L. Thompson Lecture Series committee. "She shows us an undergraduate degree from K-State can get you pretty far."

Hébert earned a bachelor's degree in philosophy and political science from K-State in 1979 and a law degree from the University of Kansas School of Law in 1982.

Hébert's most recent publications include "Sexual Harassment Is Gender Harassment" in the April 1995 edition of the University of Kansas Law Review and "The Economic Implications of Sexual Harassment for Women" in the spring 1994 edition of the Kansas Journal of Law and Public Policy, Frieman said.

The Dorothy L. Thompson Lecture Series honors the memory of Thompson, who was an associate University attorney at K-State until her death in 1992.

Thompson developed K-State's affirmative action policy and the Commission on the Status of Women.

The lecture series is supported by Dorothy Thompson Lecture patrons and corporate sponsors, along with funding from various K-State departments.

Previous lecturers include Joycelyn Elders, former U.S. surgeon general, and Nadine Strossen, president of the American Civil Liberties Union.

She shows us an undergraduate degree from K-State can get you pretty far.

Instructors at the three universities will teach the class together using multi-institutional resources, some form of video or audio technology and the Internet and World Wide Web, Starrett said.

Cooperation between the universities allows more material to be covered. Each instructor has a specific expertise to offer in the development of the courses, Starrett said.

Pahwa and Starrett plan to use the World Wide Web as an important resource for the classes.

Because this is a new subject area, there is no textbook available for the classes. All text information will be made available on the World Wide Web. They hope to eventually develop a textbook in hypertext and paper form for the classes.

"We can make up examples so that students can be reading the textbook on the computer, and instead of writing out an example like you would see in a textbook, you can actually have the student go to the program itself and run some real simulations instead of seeing static things on text," Starrett half of all new HIV infections in the United States occur to someone under 25 years of age.

"Teens are the fastest-growing risk group," said Kathy Busch, director of community relations at St. Francis Hospital and Medical Center, who is involved in the AIDS care team at the hospital.

"The quilt is a great educational tool," she said.

"It is so widespread, and when you see it, you can really understand the enormity of this disease. It is really overpowering."

Many volunteers for the NAMES Project are friends and family of AIDS victims.

Among the Topeka volunteers were Ruth and Dean Cook, the parents of Dean Cook, a K-state graduate in fine arts who died in 1991 only a year after he was diagnosed HIV-positive.

His parents had submitted one panel when the quilt came through in 1993, and they submitted another Sunday.

"For me, it's been very healing to be a part in this," Ruth Cook said. "The new panel is more of a celebration of his life. It's just a different time for us."

"The quilt has such a visual impact," she said. "You can hear it and hear it and hear it, but until you see it you really can't feel it."

The statistics are equally overwhelming.

The World Health Organization estimates 6,000 people per day are infected with HIV.

Five hundred women die from AIDS each day, and 3,000 more women are infected. 1.5 million children have been infected with HIV, and in 1994 alone, WHO estimated that 13-15 million adults had been infected.

Teens are the fastest-growing risk group. The quilt is a great educational tool.

"I did the right thing. I was a battered woman, and I got out," Conrad said. "I didn't want to raise my daughter to think that it was normal for a man to hit his wife or my son to think it was okay for him to hit his wife."

"I had to get help because to leave my husband was to live in poverty," she said. "A minimum-wage job will not support a family."

Melodie Pooler, a teacher at Manhattan Middle school and K-State graduate who has also been a foster parent, said she would not be where she is now without the help of the system.

Pooler said despite the myth of the lazy welfare mother, she was on assistance when she started school because her husband left her with three children. She said with the help of these programs that are in danger now, she got her degree in four years.

"I went to school full-time. I worked part-time, and I slept every other night to get my degree because I had no family to help me, because I was once in foster care myself," Pooler said. "For some reason that does not sound lazy to me."

Some of the speakers were recovering alcoholics or drug addicts who got on welfare after they got sober in order to put their lives back together, including Derita Strong, a Wichita resident.

"They talk about the gang violence. They talk about people on drugs. If they make these cuts, they won't be able to come in here to work because they'll have to stay at home to protect their things from addicts like us," Strong said.

The solution is in the power of voting, said Sky Westerland, Lawrence resident. She said the state declared her a non-cooperative parent because she wanted a college degree.

"When I look out at all of you," she said, "I see women. I see men. I see black people. I see white people. I see young people. I see old people and gays and lesbians, but mostly I see voters."

"In the '60s, the question was what if they gave a war and nobody came," she said. "The question for the '90s, and in 1996, is what if they gave an election and everybody came?"

clothing of the African culture," Agosto said.

For Chinda Smith, junior in public relations, the Ebony Fashion Revue was used for more aesthetic purposes.

"It gave me a chance to see all the clothes out for '96, and it was just a good opportunity for all the African American students to come together and do something positive and fun," Smith said.

Modeling in the Ebony Fashion Revue was not only fun, but it also gave the student models a chance to meet and get to know other students better.

"I thought this was a great opportunity for me to be able to mingle with the other black students on K-State's campus, especially when I really didn't know a lot of them until the fashion show," Agosto said.

Lucy Smith II, sophomore in marketing, said he liked to see styles he could relate to. Smith also said he thought the Ebony Fashion Revue was a good way to let the businesses in Manhattan know that there is a need to accommodate the shopping needs of minorities in the Manhattan area.

"It let them know that black people do shop at their stores. Not a lot of the stores pay attention to us because there's not a whole lot of us here," Smith said.

Lopez said she believed this event tied in well with Free Your Mind Week because it opened up understanding for the campus.

► ELECTION COMMITTEE

Changes in election may improve turnout
 Marci McNeal
 staff reporter

Changes in the election format and polling station locations has the election committee hopeful for a large turnout in the upcoming elections.

"Our goal during this year's election is to have 5,000 students come out and vote, which is an increase from the 3,300 students who voted last year," said Chad Schneider, chairman of the Election Committee and senior in architectural engineering and construction science.

Schneider said in the general election, students will be voting on all the College Councils seats, instead of just the Arts and Sciences and Agriculture councils. The colleges of Education, Engineering, Human Ecology, Business and Architecture will be added to the ballot.

"Because of this new change, we have moved the polling stations on the first day of voting to the individual colleges," Schneider said. "You will be able to vote at your college from 7:30 a.m. to 4:30 p.m. on Tuesday, and then it will move back to the Union on the last day of voting."

Schneider said the polling station locations have been a concern to the students in the past, and hopefully the change will help make voting easier.

The change in polling location has been an idea of the Election Committee for the last year.

"This has been in the works for a while, but our committee took charge, met with all the college council presidents and got the changes done in time for this year's election," said Sean Asbury, Election Committee member and senior in finance.

Asbury said every college council had to change its constitution to make voting at the same time universal on campus.

"This had to be done before we could implement the computer voting system," Asbury said.

Schneider said the proposed computer voting system could double voter turnout once it is implemented.

"The program will be created to be compatible with one of the three computer systems used on campus, and the administration will decide which

Program to provide food stamp education
 Janet Blanchat
 staff reporter

The K-State University Extension Family and Consumer Sciences is helping 11 counties with food stamp education.

"The main focus of the program is nutrition education and information on the family budget," said Mary Gray, extension assistant director for family and consumer sciences.

Meredith Pearson, assistant professor of the Extension Nutrition Program, said she agreed.

"It's an educational component of the food stamp program," Pearson said.

Pearson said the people who are being taught in this project are people who are receiving food stamps or who are eligible.

"This program is for low-income people, and it is so they can use these food stamps in a most effective way," Pearson said.

Pearson said the program teaches people how to shop more effectively.

"What we are trying to do is help people use these resources. We're going to teach them how to compare prices," Pearson said.

She also said the education involves reading labels, learning basic skills and basic food sanitation, so food doesn't get thrown out.

The project involves three Extension workers whose job is to provide educational material such as videos, fact sheets and other teaching materials, Pearson said. The local county agents do the instructing, she said.

Committee outlines price increases, program cutbacks at Lafene

 Brett Mast
 staff reporter

Staff reductions, price increases and program cancellations at Lafene Health Center were outlined during the Student Health Advisory Committee meeting Monday.

The $83 student health fee passed by Student Senate will still require a considerable reduction of staff and services, Lannie Zweimiller, director of Lafene, said.

"Students are going to see a considerable change in accessibility," Zweimiller said.

The fee leaves Lafene with $392,000 less than it received last year, he said.

The loss of money will require a reduction in staff, including one pharmacist, a full-time doctor and two part-time student positions.

Another full-time doctor's duties will be reduced by 25 percent.

"This will result in a loss of 35 patient slots a day," Zweimiller said.

A 10-hour reduction in operation hours will cause another 60 time slots to be lost every week, he said.

Funding for speech and auditory services and physically disabled and learning disability services will also have to be eliminated, he said.

"Given what we know now, that is what we have to do to meet those dollar figures," Zweimiller said.

In addition to the loss of services, prices for many of the remaining ones will likely increase, he said.

"We are going to have to look at increasing charges for services such as labs, X-rays and physical therapy by about 18 percent in order to meet this funding," Zweimiller said.

Even with the cuts and losses, the quality of services should stay at a reasonable level, he said.

"While we dropped back some, I think we succeeded in maintaining a good-quality program," Zweimiller said.

Chris Nowland, representative from G-M underwriters, was also in attendance, and she described the proposed changes to next year's student insurance program.

According to the numbers of claims and the amount of each claim the premium rates for next year would have to increase by 14 percent for the coverage to remain at the current level, Nowland said.

With the increase, the premium for a single student would rise from $863 this year to $987 next year, Nowland said.

Members of the committee decided to take the matter under advisement and will discuss it at the next meeting.

SHAC will meet again at 1:30 p.m. on April 1 in Lafene 231.

Former student body president returns to K-State to work in College of Agriculture

 Sara Edwards
 staff writer

The opportunity to work at a job that combined higher education and agriculture lured Jackie McClaskey, former student body president, back to K-State.

McClaskey has started her new position, assistant director for academic programs in the College of Agriculture.

She said one thing she hopes to accomplish is to continue to expand the definition of agriculture.

"I can't think of a better place to serve this position than the K-State College of Agriculture," she said.

She said she thinks her experiences as a student leader at K-State will help her to serve the students.

"She really impressed me with her interest in helping students. That's what she'll have the opportunity to do," said Dave Mugler, associate dean of the College of Agriculture and director of agricultural academic programs.

McClaskey said one of her main responsibilities is working with high school and college students about career choices and to show them what the College of Agriculture has to offer at K-State and after they graduate.

She said that a career in agriculture can appeal to all individuals, not just those with a background in agriculture.

According to the U.S. Department of Agriculture, employment in agriculture is increasing.

Her duties involve recruitment, advising general agriculture students and teaching the "Ag Employment" class.

She will also serve as adviser for the Ag Ambassadors and the KSU Ag REPS Programs.

McClaskey served as student body president from November 1991 to May 1993.

She was a member of many campus activities and honor societies.

She was also active in the College of Agriculture, serving in many organizations which she will now advise.

After graduating from K-State with a bachelor's degree in agricultural economics and receiving a masters degree from Texas A&M University, McClaskey worked as communications director for U.S. Representative Sam Brownback's election campaign.

She then served as Brownback's press secretary and agriculture and higher education policy coordinator since January 1995.

McClaskey said Brownback appointed her to her position because of her interest in agricultural and higher education policy issues.

She said she took the job at K-State to further her interests in these issues.

"Eventually I was going to be looking for an opportunity to further my interest in education and agriculture," McClaskey said.

POLICE INVESTIGATE DAMAGE

Between 5:30 a.m. and 4:21 p.m. Sunday there were 10 reports to the Riley County Police Department of damaged or stolen mailboxes.

One report mentioned damage to seven mailboxes on the 1900 block of Judson.

Sgt. Joe Stech of the Riley County Police Department said the damage varies, but it looks like the incidents were related.

"We think they're related because of the way they were damaged. It looked like they were run over," Stech said.

An investigation was underway, and there were no suspects at that time, Stech said.

"Some people believe they may have heard something at 2:30 a.m.," he said.

CLINTON TO PROPOSE TAX CUTS

WASHINGTON (AP) — President Clinton plans to unveil a fiscal 1997 budget Tuesday calling for nearly $100 billion in tax cuts during the next seven years, documents show. The plan also projects a balanced budget by 2002 and assumes Clinton will strike a deal with Republicans for some quick savings.

Pages from the president's election-year budget, obtained by the Associated Press, show that Clinton expects a $164.2-billion deficit in fiscal 1997, which begins Oct. 1, dropping to a $7.6-billion surplus in 2002. That would be the first year the government completed with black ink in its ledger book since 1969.

Fiscal 2002 is the same year Clinton and Republicans aimed at for balancing the budget during their year-long, inconclusive fiscal battle last year. The president's decision to retain 2002 as a target — which congressional Republicans plan to do as well — reflects a desire to avoid accusations that they are letting their budget-balancing deadline slip.

The president's fiscal recipe follows the outline he released last month and offers he made during budget talks with Republicans. It would rely mostly on $124 billion in savings from Medicare, $59 billion from Medicaid, $40 billion from welfare, plus $297 billion from annually approved general government programs.

There would be $99.7 billion in tax cuts through 2002 — about half of what Republicans have proposed — largely for families and small businesses.

At 12:04 a.m., John at Job Corps, 4620 Eureka Drive, reported Ronald P. Dawson Jr., a 17-year-old, 5'11", 130-pound black male, as missing. A child in need of care report was filed.

At 1:45 a.m., Keith L. Pimple, 1960 Anderson Ave., Apt. 8, was held at Shop Quick, 430 Fort Riley Blvd., for petty theft of magazines.

COMMENTARY

K-State should consider more public spaces

Space series

This is the second in a series of five articles concerning and evaluating different concepts of space on the K-State campus which will appear daily this week. Russell Fortmeyer is a junior in architectural engineering and an observer of campus planning, design and history.

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

How many times have you been walking through campus and were stopped momentarily by a group of people talking in the middle of a sidewalk?

It has happened to everyone — some of us even get mad. Is our aggression valid? If so, are we directing it at the right people?

If spaces to gather, sit and socialize were more plentiful at K-State, this might never occur.

Public space, as opposed to open space, is a place for observing. It's a plaza, piazza, square or secluded alcove in which people openly interact through chance or planned meetings or outdoor functions such as concerts and demonstrations.

Whereas open space is a natural green space, public space can be a highly constructed system of steps, platforms, benches, lights, planters, sculpture and fountains.

Mark Taussig, University landscape architect, said the University is interested in creating public spaces, but it's mostly a financial issue.

What space do you use? Because the Union is the most used building on campus, its adjoining public space is perhaps the most visible and utilized outdoor space at K-State.

"We've talked about the Union plaza for decades," Taussig said. "There is so much pedestrian traffic to make it a wonderful public space. It's because of money it never happened."

Since the Student Government Association passed the Union Expansion project in 1994, money has been collected not only for the expansion, but also for the enhancement of the street to the Union's north side into a pedestrian plaza.

Taussig said he is not sure what will be built at the Union plaza, but he's not sure it will be the type of grand public plaza most envision.

Tim Keane, professor of landscape architecture, said the Union plaza is a dead space.

"It has some activity because of its location," Keane said. "As far as the space, it does not facilitate or enhance that activity."

The plaza should be an outdoor extension of the Union, he said.

"It's a space that virtually everyone who comes to campus passes through, and it should make a statement," he said.

However, not all public spaces need to make this type of statement.

"You need a mix of large-scale and small-scale spaces," Keane said. "Some people are not drawn to large spaces with large amounts of people."

"In order to get a balance, you need to look at the whole campus," he said. "You need to think of not only the different character and functions of spaces but the connections."

Keane said the way in which buildings have just filled in empty spaces has lost the connection of the remaining open spaces.

"You can walk around campus, and it's almost that you discover certain spaces. It's not that you're led to them by any coherent pattern," Keane said.

Perhaps the ultimate example of this discovery concept is Seaton Court. Just south of Lafene Health Center, this secluded courtyard is almost a secret from many people, and yet it functions as one of the few truly public spaces at K-State.

Other public spaces, such as east of Burt Hall, the clock near Holtz Hall and the brick court north of Anderson Hall are examples of widely used, moderately sized public spaces.

The fountain under the radio tower south of Calvin Hall, the sculpture alcove north of Willard Hall and Seaton Court are examples of ignored, poor and unknown public space, respectively.

Glaring examples of no space where space is needed include McCain Auditorium and Nichols Hall, both of which are widely used public buildings for performances and both of which offer no outdoor gathering space.

Public space can also act as an alternative classroom space, not just a luxury reserved for art and architecture classes.

"I think you can ask a lot of instructors if they would hold class outdoors and they would say sure," Keane said. "But do they? Probably not much."

"Do we have any outdoor spaces to hold class that are really set up to be functional over a range of climates? I don't think we do."

There have been missed opportunities for the creation of public space as well.

Taussig said he has recently been told Mid-Campus Drive will re-open with the completion of Farrell Library.

There has been talk within the administration about keeping the drive closed to vehicular traffic and creating a pedestrian plaza linking the west and east sides of campus.

"I was disappointed because there didn't seem to be much discussion about it," Taussig said. "The campus development committee has head-strongly supported the idea."

"It causes some inconveniences for vehicles but not for a majority of people who use the campus," Taussig said. "The majority of people on campus are on foot."

"The library will become a 24-hour-a-day facility and is an academic focal point," Taussig said. "It's physically located near the center of campus, and it sure would be nice to have some great spaces with that."

Taussig said the library budget does not include landscaping and such elementary things as sidewalks.

Taussig said most of the money K-State Facilities has to add benches and landscaping to a building's surroundings comes from the building's budget.

With the budget for the Throckmorton expansion, benches, lights and trash receptacles were added, Taussig said. There is no base campus budget for benches, he said.

"We have to fight to keep those things in the budget," Taussig said.

A plan to add a driveway and plaza to McCain has been proposed for a number of years but never acted upon.

The newest space on campus will be the Bayer Memorial Geology Plaza, to be built this spring southwest of Thompson Hall. The intimate seating plaza, completely funded by a private gift from the Bayer family, will be shaped like the state of Kansas and embedded with rock fragments which occur around the state.

Its history, however, is testament to K-State's concern for public space.

According to an article in the Collegian on

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

The brick court north of Anderson Hall naturally attracts students because of its central location on campus.

Feb. 28, 1986, the plaza was proposed by James Underwood, professor of geology, in 1982. The article also states the plaza would be built in fall 1986.

It's been more than one decade and the smallest plaza is finally starting construction.

In the past, many ambitious ideas were proposed and never followed through.

K-Stater magazine reported in 1989 a new, grand University entrance involving razing Memorial Stadium to build the art museum, the creation of the Union plaza, an outdoor amphitheater and a fountain circle to be between the Union and the new art museum. The University went so far as to include the stadium site in its fundraising brochure for the museum.

None of this has ever materialized.

TOLES

Let the pandering begin

If K-State can be considered clown college, then student government can easily be considered the circus.

Where else do unknown students billboard their names a thousand times across campus as if simple repetition builds dignity?

Where else will students call up student organizations in which they have absolutely no concerted interest and beg them for a vote or endorsement?

I, for one, refuse to be used by this process unless I'm offered food (and the occasional toothful of drink), money, companionship or, at the very least, some bubble gum.

In this weekly column, I hope to give you the chance to know the meat-behind-the-potatoes. I just ask you to take your meat with a grain of salt. I'd also like to stipulate Bob Woodward had absolutely nothing to do with the content.

The way I figure it, each presidential candidate has around $1,000 to spend. (This doesn't include the real amount spent, since historically most candidates lie about how much they really spend.) That, my friends, can buy many votes.

If any of us can really be expected to vote for these clowns running for Student Senate, the so-called executive branch, Union Governing Board, Board of Student Publications Inc. or Fine Arts Council, we should at least have some expectations:

Expectation No. 1: The words "student fees" will not be mentioned for the duration of the semester.

Myview

RUSSELL Fortmeyer

ADRIAN FLEMING

Expectation No. 2: See expectation No. 1.

What we need, more than ever, in student governing positions are students who are sensitive to the campus — not small-time politicians.

This past year, student government has done more than its share of damage. Thanks to this student fee process, many administrators and student services directors feel estranged from the Student Governing Association — mainly due to shabby treatment.

Last semester, a spokeswoman for the Campus Girl Scouts was practically reduced to tears by the extremely bitter and vile Student Senate.

Of course, these are the same senators who organize into blocks to vote behind one member's preposterous whims rather than exercise their right to individualism.

As an outgoing student senator, I think I can faithfully say I've seen the face of SGA, and it makes me cry.

Behind all of these closed-door meetings and arranged votes, the campaign plotting and posing and the kindergarten-economic philosophies lies the common student.

This common student, who is likely to be repulsed by the inner workings of such a parasitical organization, is empowered by one precious thing: a vote.

It might be cliché to encourage students to vote, but this is the Collegian, after all.

As we enter this new campaign season, we must remember there are real candidates out there among us.

They won't be the ones with flashy T-shirts, banners or other such gifts. They certainly won't be the ones who have hordes of followers willing to prostrate themselves. Hell, no.

These intellectual and thoughtful candidates are too busy in class. They are too busy preparing for Open House. They are too busy with campus activities to hang more than a few signs.

But they are willing to talk. They are willing to listen. They are not polarizers; they are the people sitting next to you in class.

These candidates won't be proposing some sort of outlandish, grand policy as a panacea to every student problem known to man. They aren't going to do that because that won't work, and it never has.

If you exercise your right not to vote, just remember no student leader on this campus will ever feel compelled to speak for you. Just as Bob Dole won't be pandering to the Democratic Party members, future senators will not pander to you (unless, of course, you can offer something in return — whether that be political or material).

Well, Bozo, let the pandering begin.

SENATE ELECTED TO SERVE STUDENTS

Editor,

Senators, have you forgotten?

Some of the issues that have been going on with our student government lately have been less than professional and at times bordering on infantile. I cannot believe the amount of bad-mouthing and slandering some of these senators have stooped to in the hopes of making their point.

Wake up, guys! Last time I checked, we elected you to serve us, the students, not yourselves. Have you forgotten what it is you should be working toward? If not, then perhaps all of you should resign. You are in the Senate to pass and enforce legislation that will benefit the student body as a whole. You should all be working together for the common good of students instead of engaging in childish vendettas against one another simply because you don't agree on issues.

It is disheartening to see a lot of you ripping into Jeff Peterson for vetoing the original Lafene increase. How can you attack him for fulfilling a promise he made to the student body last year at this time? Senators, he did what he promised he would do.

This is one of the few times in history that you will probably ever see a campaign promise kept, yet some of you reacted with anger and hostility. I didn't like the veto, but at least I can and will say I can respect the decision made and the reasons why it was made.

All of you have a hard job to do, so instead of ripping each other to shreds, why don't you all work together and serve the students as you were elected to do? If you can't be objective and respectful, then get out and let in someone who can.

Either way, the conduct of the Senate needs to change in a more positive direction. You were elected to represent the students, so quit fighting among yourselves and do the job you were elected to do.

FRIIGHT MIGHT BE BECAUSE OF GENDER, NOT RACE

Editor,

I am writing in response to Eric Waters' column on March 14. I would like to begin by saying I agree with a lot of the things Waters said. It is a shame that our society stereotypes so many of its people.

Toward the end of his column, though, Waters made reference to a situation where a woman, "due to her stereotypes of black males," was frightened by his presence late one evening as she was walking alone on campus. This woman should not be accused of stereotyping black males. Instead, she should be admired for her self-awareness. I would like to point out that I, too, would have been frightened.

From the time we are little girls, we are taught to be afraid. Our parents teach us to stay away from strangers, and as we grow up, we are faced with attacks against women, such as rape, domestic violence and assault. In fact, many of the popular movies portray women as victims.

Women are forced to alter their lives. They must monitor how they dress, where they go and when. They can not safely walk across campus, walk to their cars or jog alone at night. We have become prisoners of our fear.

Perhaps this woman walking alone at night was not afraid because Waters is a black man, but simply that he is a man.

Fake baking too much risk

Fry now, pay later.

I know a strawberry-blond with pale, beautiful skin who will tell you this if she catches you heading off to expose yourself to ultraviolet radiation. You just have to smirk and shrug, because you know she is right — maybe you will pay later.

But today — today you need a tan. There are a couple of ways you might go about procuring one. First, you might try going out into the sun-shine, but it is not always readily available. The sun is a fickle, fair-weather friend.

Should the sun fail to appear when you want it, you might choose a more direct and dependable route to a tan.

If you are willing to pay a little up-front, tanning beds will do the job even at night, and there are no extraneous elements involved — no friends, no bathing suits, no fun. It is just you, naked in a pool of your own sweat, enclosed in a contraption something akin to a coffin.

Isn't that how Jimi Hendrix died? No, I believe it was actually a pool of his own vomit. That's right. He lived fast and died young and beautiful.

I tend to think he was simply too good to last too long, yet somehow I doubt that he had this in mind as he did the things that speeded his death.

Whenever I go sun-seeking, I do not do so hoping it is going to kill me before I have the chance to grow old and decrepit. I do it because I am young, it is fun, and it is not going to kill me today.

Youth is incredible stuff. My friends and I have spent sunny days greasing ourselves with a mixture of iodine and baby oil, then proceeding to lie down and sizzle.

I have played softball all day in the sun without applying sunscreen at any point. It was not that I did not realize this sort of behavior might lead me to look like my ball glove in 10 years, or even worse, that it might lead to skin cancer. I knew full well what might happen, but the thrill was great enough and the consequences were distant enough to make me throw caution to the wind. Of course, beyond the euphoria of defiance in the sun-shine, I received the lingering gratification of a buff tan. I believe it is worthwhile to stop and consider exactly why it was gratifying.

What does a suntan really mean? On the surface, it means your skin is damaged. But this type of skin damage is admirable. People dig it. And they dig it because it says something about the wearer of the damage. It is a youthful badge indicating one who has dwelled in the sun.

Anytime, though, you cannot be so sure. It might just mark someone who shelled out a few bucks to fake bake. In the middle of March, in the middle of Kansas, a tan just is not very convincing of anything other than vanity. It is no more beautiful than it is admirable.

I cannot understand why people would subject themselves to the risk of perennial skin damage without any of the fun that goes with the old-fashioned tan. If you are going to do a striptease for death, you should at least have fun doing it. Otherwise, it is just plain silly.

I am all for carpe diem skin damage if you feel the risk is worth it, but when our society places so much value on a tan that people are willing to fry themselves unnaturally, for no good reason, maybe it is an indication of some kind of problem. The costs of fake-baking are too much to pay now or even somewhere down the road.

24 women of K-State will be fighting for the 12 spots in the 1996-97

ΔΥ calendar

by Marci McNeal

Spring break will last longer than a week this year.

Students will have the month of April to see 24 K-State women competing for the Delta Upsilon's Women of K-State Calendar.

For three consecutive Thursdays in April, 24 women will be competing for one of the 12 spots in the Delta Upsilon Women of K-State Calendar.

The competition will begin at 9 p.m. April 4 and will continue on April 11 and 18 at Bombers.

"The first three nights of the contest is the general competition with eight new girls competing each night," said Brandon Timm, co-philanthropy chair and sophomore in business.

Timm said four of the eight women each night will advance to the final round, which will be April 25.

The final round will consist of the 12 girls who advanced each night from the general competition. This round will determine the winners of the first, second and third-place prizes and also who will get to be on the cover of the calendar.

"The first prize will consist of a cruise for two to the Caribbean, $200 in cash and gift certificates; the second prize will be $150 in cash and gift certificates, and the third-place prize will be $75 in cash and gift certificates," Timm said.

The DUs are trying something new in this year's competition.

"This year, instead of just the faculty judging, we will have a group of the calendar sponsors judge the first night; faculty judge the second night; sponsors judge again on the third night, and then DU alumni will judge the final round of competition," said David Hallquist, co-philanthropy chair and sophomore in business.

Hallquist said this would ensure fairness all the way around during the different nights of competition.

The 24 women who will compete in the calendar competition were chosen by Timm and Hallquist after going through an interview process.

"I would say we interviewed about 45 women, and we had to go through a process of elimination by interviewing the women and looking at the information sheets they filled out," Timm said.

Hallquist said the questions asked during the interview dealt with the women's interests, activities on and off campus, what their ideal date would be and why they were interested in appearing in the calendar.

Any women attending K-State had the opportunity to enter the contest.

The 24 women who will be participating in the calendar competition will compete in three rounds: the formal, active and the swimsuit.

Timm said in the formal round the women will wear nice dinner dresses or formals and will walk around, and the master of ceremonies will ask each woman a question.

"This year Cunningham's Bridal Boutique will provide dresses to the participants for this round," Hallquist said.

In the activewear round, the women will wear outfits provided by Ballard's Sporting Goods. The women will wear their own swimsuits in the swimsuit round.

The winners of the calendar contest will be photographed by Nathan Ham of Topeka.

"I really enjoyed working with Nathan. I chose what I wanted to wear, and he went with my decision," said Robyn Pierce, Miss March in the 1995-96 calendar and junior in nutrition.

Pierce said she got to meet a lot of new friends during the calendar competition and was called by a modeling agent.

"I was asked to join an agency after they saw my picture in the calendar, so I decided to join the agency," Pierce said.

"We try to make the calendar as classy as possible. The women can choose what to wear, so they remain comfortable at all times," Timm said.

The DUs are trying to combat any negative attention toward the calendar.

"We try to make people see that the calendar benefits a lot of children," Timm said.

All the proceeds the calendar raises go toward DU's philanthropy.

"We give all the money from this event to the Villages of Topeka, which homes wayward children," Timm said. "These children that our philanthropy deals with have been abused and neglected by their parents."

The 1996-97 Delta Upsilon Women of K-State Calendar will be available for sale when students arrive back for school in August.

"My parents even have a copy of the calendar," Pierce said. "My dad was skeptical at first, but after he saw the picture he was really proud of me."

The calendar is sponsored by the DUs, Dean Liquor, Nathan Ham, Classic Rose Limousine Service, Borck Brothers, Sun Connection, Ballard's Sporting Goods, Coors Light, Bombers, KMKF-FM 101.5 and Cunningham's Bridal Boutique.

"I had a lot of fun doing the calendar. It feels good to be able to say you've been in a calendar," said Angie Jensen, Miss October in the 1995-96 calendar and junior in textile science.

We try to make the calendar as classy as possible. The women can choose what to wear, so they remain comfortable at all times.

CO-PHILANTHROPY CHAIR OF DELTA Upsilon CALENDAR CONTEST

The Fortmeyer Files

by Russell Fortmeyer

This week
Jawwad Abdulhaqq junior in political science and BSU President

Russell: This is your second term as president of Black Student Union. What issues has BSU faced this past year?

Jawwad: The biggest thrust for us, since I've been president for the last two years, was to move the organization to be self-sufficient — to be totally reliant on itself for fund-raising, being more visible in the University, doing more programming and building a membership through outreach.

Russell: What issues are prevalent in the African American community at K-State?

Jawwad: I would say the issues are centered around the academics and what is actually being done in the retention aspect of African American students. Why is K-State one of the only universities in the Big 8 that doesn't have an African/African American studies program, and why is K-State one of the only universities where student government doesn't fully financially support the organization? We're one of the lowest BSUs in the Big 8 for receiving funds from SGA.

Russell: How has being president of BSU changed your perspective of college life?

Jawwad: It just enhanced a lot of things I had already gained. I did four years of military in the army before I came here. I came here on a mission to get involved and hopefully make some changes, and Black Student Union gave me that avenue to bring about some changes.

What I've learned the most is the concept of networking, communicating with different people and seeing that even most African Americans have different opinions and different ways of doing things. Working in that environment helped me to get a grasp of how to deal with those different people.

Russell: You're a junior in political science. What do you want to do with your career?

Jawwad: I'm interested in local politics. Right now, I'm planning to go to graduate school. I'm looking at public administration, urban planning and regional and community planning. I'm interested in staying involved and keeping myself in a position where I can keep bringing about change for African Americans on campus and in the community.

Russell: Why is an organization like BSU important on campus?

Jawwad: For one, I think a lot of people fail to realize no matter how you slice the cake, we all are different. We all have different interests. We all have a different way of doing things. Black Student Union is a group that, in a sense, gives you another flavor — another outlook on how to do things.

It gives you different perceptions on different issues. It helps the whole recruitment and retention of the campus. If there's no African American students heard at this campus, then it's going to be hard to get African Americans to come to this campus. If there's no Hispanics, it's going to be hard to get Hispanics here.

It brings culture to the campus as a whole, being that this is a learning environment and this is where we should get it down as far as the differences we have.

Russell: How did the Black Student Union Big 8 Conference turn out last month?

Jawwad: It was named the best Big 8 conference in its 19 years. Our Black Student Union won the outstanding black student government award. We had over 3,500 students in attendance. We dealt with getting students to take a more proactive stand on issues. It was great.

Russell: Do you think K-State is a sensitive and receptive community?

Jawwad: I would say on the whole, yes, but at the same time even those outside the African American community fail to realize there is a difference of opinion — even from within the African American community.

Just because black students did something this year doesn't mean it's going to be done the same way next year.

Overall the campus is very sensitive and aware of Black Student Union. The campus has seen the organization grow to be a more visible and active group.

Russell: Why did you get involved in student government as a senator?

Jawwad: Basically, politics is my nature. I wanted to get more of a hands-on, personal experience. Learning the legislative process has been very important for me.

I also wanted to be a voice, in particular for African Americans, but as a whole for multicultural students on campus — to be somewhat of that conscious voice for the rest of the senators there.

I like it a lot.

Russell: Many white students on campus don't know a lot about their heritage.

Is something like a white student union politically possible or necessary?

Jawwad: I think that's true, but BSU is not necessarily the avenue for one to learn their heritage. One of the major components of it is as a support group for African Americans coming from the inner-city to a predominantly white campus. It's that home-away-from-home.

I would be for a white student union. Just thinking about that reminds me of a time in Student Senate when a senator kept using the term "ethnic groups" referring to minority groups, I suppose.

Everyone has some heritage, and I think everyone should be given an opportunity to share that with everyone, not just based on color of skin. Even within BSU we have white students and Asian-American students.

In my opinion the University has things in place that are founded on the support for white students, historically. There's already a niche for white students to get into, whether it's the greek system or even sports. You can't say the same thing is there for minority students or multicultural students.

It would be something different.

Russell: You're originally from St. Louis. How different is living in Manhattan?

Jawwad: There's more a sense of community and more ground-level opportunities for minorities and people alike, in Manhattan. There aren't a lot of things here, so you have the opportunity of bringing things here.

Russell: Do you plan to stay in Kansas after you graduate?

Jawwad: This is home. I'm through with big cities. This will be home for a while.

Russell: Is there any membership guideline for squirrels in Black Student Union? Can they join?

Jawwad: Of course, if they can pay a dollar. They're welcome to join.

Russell: Do you know of any ways a squirrel could come up with a dollar?

Jawwad: No.

Future looks good for Big 12 women's hoops

Lost amid the bright lights and never-ending hype we call March Madness is a little-known tournament. It is called the NCAA Women's Championship.

And if you want to know just how big the Big 12 will be next year, look no farther than the world of women's hoops.

Not that the rest of the Big 12 is going to be weak. Seven future members played in post season bowl games, with six bringing home victories. Two schools own NCAA volleyball titles (Nebraska and Texas). And despite a down year among Big 8 schools, six member institutions earned NCAA men's basketball bids, with Kansas and Texas Tech advancing to the Sweet 16.

But for game-in, game-out competitiveness on both the conference and national levels, Big 12 women's hoops might top the list.

Seven member schools made the Big Dance this year: Colorado (No. 3 West), Texas Tech (No. 4 Midwest), Kansas (No. 4 East), Texas (No. 5 East), Oklahoma State (No. 7 Midwest), Texas A&M (No. 7 West) and Nebraska (No. 9 West).

Five advanced to the second round, and two (Texas Tech and the winner of Monday's Kansas-Texas game in Lawrence) made the Sweet 16.

Only the Southeast Conference, traditionally the benchmark by which other conferences are judged, can boast of similar numbers.

This is no anomaly. The Southwest Conference has always been a women's basketball powerhouse, with Texas (1986) and Texas Tech (1993) winning national championships.

And there's no letting down in the near future.

Both Tech and UT return most of their key players.

South Division fellows Oklahoma State and Texas A&M face significant losses due to graduation, but both have tradition and good coaching — a combination which virtually ensures their return to prominence if they do slip.

In the North, leaders Kansas and Colorado look to be as good as ever next year. The Buffaloes must replace defensive stopper DeCelle Thomas and three-point ace Amy Palmer. But the dominating post duo of Erin Scholz and Raegan Scott return.

Even more important, point guard Michelle Hasheider came into form late in the season after injuries limited her playing time early. Named to the Big 8 All-Tournament Team, Hasheider should give the Buffs the floor leadership and outside punch they have lacked without Shelly Sheetz.

DAN
Lewerenz

Kansas will have to replace Charisse Sampson. But the other four starters return, including Big 8 Player of the Year Tamecka Dixon.

The Hawks' perimeter game is as good as they come, and the extra year will help 6-foot-3 Nakia Sanford, inconsistent this year as a freshman, develop into one of the premier posts in the conference.

The North's third tournament team, Nebraska, loses three starters.

But the return of Tina McClain and Anna DeForge, the Cornhuskers' two best players, will keep them competitive while they rebuild.

And don't forget K-State.

Yes, the Wildcats suffered through a disappointing season, finishing 14-16, 5-9 in the Big 8. But two of the Cats' conference wins came against nationally ranked Oklahoma State. Two close games against Colorado and an overtime loss to Northwestern attest to K-State's ability to play with the top teams.

The Cats will have five seniors on next year's roster. All five starters return, with three (Brit Jacobson, Andria Jones and Missy Decker) who average double-digit scoring.

It was no secret that K-State players and former Wildcat coach Brian Agler weren't on the best of terms.

With a coach the players like (the search is in progress), the Cats could turn some heads.

► SOFTBALL

Cats desire varsity status

■ K-State's softball club will be one of two teams in the Big 12 that will not be considered a varsity squad

Shane McCormick
contributing writer

Through the years, it has become one of the most vastly improved sports at K-State, but most people would not know that it is the women's softball team that has experienced such a tremendous turnaround.

Just a couple of seasons ago, the team won just one of its 22 games. But last fall, the Wildcats created a drastic turnaround. The Cats compiled a 10-7-2 record in the 1994-1995 season.

The Cats haven't stopped on their mission of success this season. It was just two weeks ago that the Cats gained a big victory over a nationally ranked team in Barton County Community College.

"Our team has become very stable. We have the same players with us that we had last semester," Coach Terra Simonson said. "Two seasons ago we had different players coming in. We developed no team chemistry."

K-State usually plays junior colleges around the Midwest. But because K-State softball is a club sport, it is not in the actual league of the junior colleges. Therefore, when they do beat nationally ranked teams like Barton, they are not rewarded for it with any ranking.

"There is nothing to show how good we've become throughout the year," Simonson said. "There's no ranking for us. All we have is the self-gratification of beating a good team."

Although the K-State softball team does not have varsity status, players on the team said they expect to gain varsity status soon.

"I really think that within the next couple of years, you'll see K-State have a varsity softball team," catcher Jamie Janke said.

Outfielder/relief pitcher Heather Borsa said she agreed. "With the addition of the Big 12, KSU and Colorado will be the only schools that don't have varsity status," she said. "K-State had a varsity program in the past. They owe it to us to bring it back."

The team receives some funding from the University. Simonson said the team receives one road trip paid for during the year. The team used that road trip last semester, so they will be paying for their next road trip.

Additionally, the team has been able to secure corporate sponsorships from the local owners of Subway.

"Subway has just been terrific," Simonson said. "They give us a donation of about $1,000, which is annually refundable."

The team has 18 women on the roster. Everyone on the team has at least played high school softball. The team has four junior college transfers that are playing this semester.

Simonson said although K-State does not have varsity status, it is not looked down upon by other coaches in the league.

"I have had coaches approach me and tell me that they really wished K-State had a varsity team," she said. "They say that they would like their daughters to come here and play."

If some teams do take the Cats lightly, they shouldn't after the Cats' last game.

In a game against Northern Iowa, the team saw the first home run by a Cat over the fences. If the Cat players had any frustration about lack of respect, catcher Jamie Janke let it all out with one hit. The sophomore recorded an incredible 275-foot home run that cleared the fences by a good five feet. Janke improved her season average to an astonishing .692. The team is open to anyone who is interested in playing softball.

If you have an interest in playing for the team, you can contact Terra Simonson at 587-0930.

Wildcats improve record to 13-6 against Rangers

John Berggren
staff writer

The K-State baseball team won two out of three games from the Regis University Rangers in a double header Saturday and a final game Sunday.

K-State lost the opening game 16-14 in an ugly way with six errors. Each team was credited with three.

Clark said the poor defensive play might have had something to do with the loss to Wichita State Friday.

"We weren't playing aggressively, and that led to some mistakes," Clark said. "We were still thinking about the Wichita State loss on Friday, and I told them they need to stop feeling sorry for themselves."

"Kids also get intimidated by the inconsistencies of the infield this time of year. It's early, and the grass is still inconsistent. We've got to stay aggressive, and we can't sit back on waiting on the ball."

Pitcher Kevin Wicker gave up nine earned runs through the first 2-1/3 innings, and after the first three innings, the Cats found themselves down 10-1.

The Cats battled back, scoring two runs in the fourth, fifth and sixth innings, and added five more in the eighth to tie the game at 12. In the top of the ninth, Regis added four more runs on four hits, including a home run from left-fielder Errol Zimmer.

The Cats came back in the bottom of the ninth to score only two runs, leaving the bases loaded after Regis gave up five walks in the inning.

In game two, a four-run first inning coasted the Cats to a 7-6 victory.

Chris Hess started things off in the first with a solo home run, his third of the season.

Two batters later, Todd Fereday singled, and Ryan McKee doubled, scoring Fereday. Ryan Buell then walked, and Paul Cranford reached first on an error by the shortstop. Frank Gappa then singled, scoring Buell and Cranford, to give the Cats a 4-1 lead.

The Cats went on to add two more runs in the second and one in the sixth to earn the K-State victory.

Sophomore Chris Traylor pitched 6-1/3 innings, giving up five runs, only two of which were earned, giving him his first career win.

Sunday's finale was all K-State as it crushed Regis 12-0, giving up only three hits in the contest.

We were still thinking about the Wichita State loss ... and I told them they need to stop feeling sorry for themselves.

Jon Oiseth led the team with a solid pitching performance through six innings, giving up only two hits while throwing a career-high nine strikeouts.

The last three innings saw the Cats pitching by committee as Mickey Blount, Jake Voos and Brian Thompson each pitched an inning. Blount gave up no hits and earned a strikeout in his first action of the year, coming off a shoulder injury. Voos came on to walk one batter but gave up no runs in the eighth, and Thompson came on in the ninth to give up one hit but no runs.

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark said the effort by his pitching staff in the game was a big plus for his team.

"Oiseth looked as sharp as we've seen him in quite a long time," Clark said. "The other three also did a good job. It's hard to get a shut-out in college ball."

"I think this game helped us get our pitching depth in order moving into conference play," he said.

At the plate, the Cats lit up Regis for 15 hits in the last game. Nine of the hits were doubles, which set a school record.

K-State gave up only one error in the game, which was much improved during the first two games in the series where it gave up five.

The TV networks, which have always been known for half-hour after half-hour of quality programming, have made their way to the Internet. These pages were previewed using Netscape (home.netscape.com).

CBS

(http://www.cbs.com/)

The design of this homepage is inconsistent. One page is nearly text only, while the next will be full of graphics. It was also strange how some pages have taken every effort to be viewable by any browser, while others can only be seen with Netscape. It seems the authors of this page don't talk to each other and never looks at anyone else's work.

There are a couple of positive points on this page. I like the schedule they offer for the week's worth of programming, and the FAQ is useful.

For fans of CBS's soap operas, I recommend the soap section. They take viewer polls and give previews. One of the other problems of this page is the advertising for different companies. It was like watching television with commercials.

NBC

(http://www.nbc.com/)

This page is designed by people who have never used a modem. Though the graphics look good, they are slow even at 3 a.m. Look at their cartoon, Digital Bob, which agrees with this assessment.

The Olympic coverage also leaves something to be desired. The quality of their coverage reminds me of the Olympic triple cast of past Olympics. You can tell this section was designed by the marketing department.

The news section is fair compared to other networks but it isn't close to being one of the best on the Internet (much like NBC's news on television).

The best part of the page is the Intellicast weather. It not only gives the forecast, but it makes radar and satellite photos available nationwide. Their local weather is better than most local forecasters, with statistics and radar available for cities as small as Topeka.

ABC has the best balance between graphics and speed of the network homepages. The page also keeps the same feel throughout.

The new show section is worth the time visiting. They have complete show descriptions along with good graphics for each show.

The news section is different from everyone else's. Instead of reporting the news like a magazine, which is the standard format on the web, they have gone to a radio-like format, keeping all of the news in Real Audio. I don't like it, but it is cool to play with.

The main thing they need to improve is the quantity. With their huge budget, I'm sure they can kick back a couple more dollars and hire another programmer.

Word of the week: Suits

These are the root of all evil in every corner of the world, including the Internet. Suits are people who must wear suits to work every day. Whether they are trying to regulate freedom of speech on the Internet or cut funding to campus organizations, they are never up to any good.

Professor balances career, family

Balancing career and family hasn't been a problem so far for Mary Albrecht, professor and undergraduate coordinator for the Department of Horticulture. After arriving at K-State in August of 1980, Albrecht planned to stay for three to 3-1/2 semesters. However, after settling into her position in the horticulture department, she enjoyed being in Kansas and has been here ever since.

"My husband, my 13-year-old son and I really enjoy Manhattan, and we don't foresee leaving any time soon," Albrecht said. "We are very happy living in this community."

Along with teaching several 900-level classes at K-State, Albrecht is the newsletter and membership officer for the local Association for Women in Science chapter and has been involved with the organization since it was founded here in 1991.

"AWIS is extremely beneficial to me because in a way, it looks out for me," Albrecht said. "I also like the way it encourages women in the science fields. It pushes me and keeps me career- and goal-oriented."

Albrecht said many times she commits herself to several things and often ends up over-committed.

"There are many things that are important to me, to my family and to my career. I try not to over-commit, but it happens," Albrecht said.

She said she spends most of her time teaching and less time doing research but that both are important to her.

Comic opera tells traditional tale

Abbi Hake
staff writer

It's a traditional story.

A wealthy father, named Orgon, forces his lovely, beautiful daughter, Mariane, to marry someone she doesn't love simply because the father is captivated by the seemingly courteous and pious young man.

That's only the first act, though.

The next two acts of "Tartuffe" are full of laughter and disguise as the other characters in the opera force Orgon to see the truth about this man, Tartuffe, to whom he has engaged his only daughter.

Orgon, played by Aaron Austin, senior in music education, is the fool in the show. He does it well, too. Too busy being utterly smitten by this young man, Tartuffe, he fails to recognize his hypocritical nature.

Everyone else knows better, though — especially Dorine, a servant to the household, played by Kelly Berry, sophomore in applied music, who is the eyes and ears of the entire household.

Dorine's witty sense of humor, combined with her influence in the household, was displayed skillfully through Berry's beautiful voice.

Tartuffe, played by Chad Pape, junior in music education, was another riveting character. Pape's skillful portrayal of a villain was adequately devious, yet terribly humorous.

Every voice in the opera was skilled on one common aspect — timing. Arguments ran rampant throughout the entire opera. When such disputes broke out, a montage of voices filled the air, each one disagreeing with the other. Each time was with impeccable punctuality.

Nichols stage was transformed into a Victorian living room for the opera.

The costumes reflected the time as well. Dresses worn by Orgon's wife, Elmire, and his daughter, Mariane, were impressive. They were adorned with gold threads and shiny, off-white pearls cascading across their bosoms and around their necks.

In the third act, Tartuffe is finally revealed as the scoundrel that everyone except Orgon has believed him to be.

He quickly changes his mind about his most trusted confidant when he overhears Tartuffe denouncing him and trying to seduce his wife.

It doesn't end yet. While Orgon was still blind to Tartuffe's true nature, he made Tartuffe the legal heir to all his riches.

The exposed villain, Tartuffe, with his deed in hand, tries to seize the property which he has legally inherited.

Orgon's family cunningly comes together in an effort to save Orgon's riches and property. They get their revenge by fooling Tartuffe, just as he has done to them.

"Tartuffe" is a modern version of the 200-year-old play written by the Frenchman Moliere. The reconstruction of the opera was done by Kirke Mechem, a Kansas native.

Performances are at 8 tonight and Thursday in Nichols Theatre.

College to help manage military lands

Stephanie Schmutz
staff writer

The College of Engineering has been selected for the Military Training Lands Management Program.

Donald Rathbone, dean of engineering and principle investigator of the project, said the Department of Defense manages more than 25 million acres of training lands that must be maintained to provide realistic training conditions.

"We are working to make uses of the lands more effective," Rathbone said. "The military already takes measures to comply with environmental requirements. Our job is to solve environmental problems before they occur."

The mission of the program is to ensure the readiness of the armed forces, Rathbone said.

"By securing the sustained use of military training lands and conserving the related biological, natural and cultural resources, the land will be more accessible for other uses," Rathbone said.

The program has been set to accomplish three main tasks.

The first task will include training lands managers to implement the U.S. Army's Integrated Training Area Management Program. This will provide a management and decision-making process that will integrate Army training and other mission requirements for land use.

The second task will include Army and National Guard trainers. Designing and training courses for military training lands managers and environmental awareness programs. These will be implemented for system that will be," Schneider said. Schneider said once the program is created and installed, the election would be able to run for 48 hours straight.

"Students will be able to vote in the computer labs on campus, from computers at home if linked to the University server and on the computers that will be placed in the Union during the elections," Schneider said.

"I think this will make it much easier for the students to vote because most of the students use the computer labs; and if they don't, computers will be available for the students who pass through the Union during election time."

The Scan-tron system will be used again during this year's general election, but plans to start on the computerized voting program will get underway this summer.

"Right after elections this year we're going to find a private consultant to write us a program for next year's election," Schneider said.

Besides the changes in polling station locations and the universal college council voting, communication has also played a part in the committee's plans to increase voter turnout this year.

"We're communicating more with the colleges and the students this year to keep everybody informed to what's going on," Schneider said.

Schneider said besides communicating more, the committee has experience from last year's election that will help smooth out any problems they might have to face this year.

Voter turnout has been on the rise in the last several years.

"I estimate that about 5,000 students voted in the 1992-93 election because there was a referendum on the ballot," said Lisa Heath, interim coordinator of student activities and services.

Schneider said whenever there is a referendum on the ballot, voter turnout increases because more people care about what is going on.

"Other voter turnout estimates are 2,300 students in the 1993-94 election, 2,600 students in the 1994-95 election and 3,300 students in the 1995-96 election," Heath said.

The Election Committee is in charge of going through the election regulations, and during the election process they also serve as the Grievance Committee.

"We are so much ahead of where we were at this time last year," Schneider said.

"We've already got all the posters made, we've communicated more about this year's election, and we are preparing for the mandatory meetings."

The general election is April 9-10, and the filing deadline was Monday.

ALBRECHT

"I spend about 70 percent of my time in and out of the classroom on teaching and the other 30 percent on research," Albrecht said.

Albrecht is active with many research projects, most of them applied research involving the evaluation of plant growth and plants' ability to grow in the off-seasons.

"I'm currently working on a collaborative effort with a professor from the University of Minnesota, who is a floral crop breeder, on how we can adapt perennials to become potted plants.

"This will enable us to grow them year-round," Albrecht said. "It's extremely exciting for me because we will be working across state lines, and it will help me to work a little bit with distance learning."

Distance learning is a concept that

Albrecht said she hopes to learn more about in the upcoming years through a sabbatical leave.

She said it will allow her to learn how students learn through technology, and she will learn how to teach more effectively in a multimedia educational society. Outside of work, she uses what little free time she has with her family or working on needlecraft projects.

"And gardening, of course," she said.

Albrecht is also successful in her teaching. She has earned many awards, including a nomination for Woman of the Year by the National Association of Women in Horticulture in 1989, Foremost Woman of the 20th Century in 1985 and Outstanding Young Woman of America in 1984.

Albrecht said that her long-term goal is to become an undergraduate-level administrator.

"Working towards it will be one of my focuses later on," she said.

military and civilian personnel and will focus on natural resource management.

The third task will include developing concepts and execution plans for a Department of Defense "Lessons Learned" Training Lands Management Center.

These plans will provide consultation, conduct research, facilitate technology transfer and help design training courses for natural resources management, conservation and environmental programs.

"We hope that the Department of Defense Training Lands Management Center will be established permanently in this region," Rathbone said.

"We are working closely with the Pentagon, and they will have the final say on the location."

The idea for the program was a collaboration of several individuals with experience in lands management.

"A group of us initially conceived the idea for the center and put together the initial proposal and videotape presentation," Rathbone said.

"The process evolved into a team effort with excellent support from President Wefald and his legislative assistant, Sue Peterson," Rathbone said.

The committee has also received help from the office of U.S. Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kansas, in Washington, D.C.

The project should be completed in September or October 1997.

"We provide these educational materials to the county agent, to the people who do the teaching," Pearson said.

There will be different methods used for teaching during this program.

"There will be several models for each county. The format of the program depends on what the county wants to do," Gray said.

She also said the program can be created to be responsive to the local county need.

"The agents will work individually or with groups of people," Gray said.

The funds from this project come from Kansas Social and Rehabilitation Services.

The official starting date was Jan. 1. The ending date is Sept. 30.

"We will apply for funding again so that the program continues," Pearson said.

"The Extension agents work with other agencies, like WIC," she said. Pearson said they work closely with WIC, the Women, Infant, and Child Program, and the health department and other social agencies.

Gray said this is a significant undertaking.

"This is the first time Kansas has presented a U.S. Department of Agriculture food stamp education program. Some states have been doing this for years," she said.

All Kansas counties were invited to participate in this program, and 11 responded, Gray said. Among them is Riley County.

The counties in this project have to provide a match of personnel or service to equal the amount of federal dollars received, Gray said.

CITY COMMISSION

Funds benefit city, University

Chris Oakley
staff writer

City commissioners decided 5-0 to execute 1996 City/University Projects Fund agreements and to include the committee's 1997 requests in the capital-improvements projects section of the city budget Tuesday night.

The City/University Projects Funds Committee, which was created as a result of the annexation of K-State in July 1994, makes recommendations to the Manhattan City Commission regarding funding for projects involving both entities. The committee is composed of members from the city, student body and faculty appointed by the mayor.

After the annexation, the city and K-State made an arrangement for President Jon Wefald to request funding for certain projects. Those recommendations are given to the committee, which then decides which ones to bring in front of the commission.

At a meeting Jan. 29, the committee prioritized five projects that it considers to be mutually beneficial to both the city and University.

Those recommendations will be in the Capital Improvement Program of the city-commission budget in late May, which commissioners will be able to vote on each City/University project.

Six projects were approved by the committee for fiscal year 1996, which will cost $355,000. The committee is recommending that five of the projects receive continued funding for fiscal year 1997. One project does not require additional funding.

The first project proposes the city give $40,000 to a bike path and emergency vehicle access. The project would provide a bicycle and emergency-access route from Ward to Willard Hall. Phase I of the project, funded with $84,000 from the city, was approved for 1996.

"The plans are being drawn up right now," Mark Taussig, University landscape architect, said.

The second project will provide eight to 10 emergency telephone installations to be completed primarily around student housing areas, Taussig said.

The phones are directly connected to the K-State Police. The committee has asked for $25,000 in 1997. The city granted $40,000 for the project for 1996.

"A person will have the ability to directly contact with campus police," Taussig said.

The third project would give $20,000 for a joint library project involving KSU Libraries and the Manhattan Public Library.

KSU Libraries requested $10,000 for technical support and training for staff and users of electronic catalogs, databases and Internet and World

Garth Brooks will be performing April 26-27 at Bramlage Coliseum. The second date was added during the rush to buy tickets March 16.

"The decision was being made while tickets were on sale," Kelly Brooks, tour manager, said.

If the demand is there, there will be another show scheduled,

Kelly Brooks said.

"We made this decision after learning from the '92 tour because of making fans unhappy," he said.

Kelly Brooks said they plan the tours a year in advance.

"You just never know what the response is going to be in the planning stage," he said.

If there is an opportunity for a second show, there will be one, he said.

PRAIRIE SPIRIT RAIL-TRAIL

State converts rails to hiking, biking trails

Richea Lecklider
staff reporter

Railroad tracks that once carried trains are being dismantled and replaced by trails for hikers and bicyclists.

Trent McCown, a 1994 K-State graduate and wildlife/park manager of the Prairie Spirit Rail-Trail, spoke Tuesday night in Throckmorton Hall.

The Prairie Spirit Rail-Trail is a 50-mile stretch of land running from Ottawa to Iola, covering parts of Franklin, Anderson and Allen counties, McCown said.

It is the first significant rail-trail in the state of Kansas, he said.

In May 1990, KCT Railway decided to abandon its line. In 1992, the title to the railroad corridor was turned over to the Kansas Department of Wildlife and Parks to begin the development of the rail-trail by railbanking.

Railbanking is an agreement between a railroad company and a private or governmental entity to use a rail line that is no longer in use as a trail.

Eighteen miles of the 50-mile stretch are smooth and improved, McCown said. As soon as the organization that is representing the Prairie Spirit Rail-Trail gets permission from the Franklin County commissioners, it will finish smoothing the rest of the trail.

The smoothing process is done by laying limestone screening, which makes the surface like concrete. It's 10-12 feet wide and handicap accessible, he said.

Vandalism is one concern of people interested in the trails.

"Other states have had very little littering, very little vandalism and very little problems on the trails," McCown said.

He said most of the damage that does occur is done by locals.

McCown said a group known as the Friends to Prairie Spirit Trail has developed to help with the progress of the trail.

"It's a volunteer organization where local people in the community do volunteer work and fund raisers for trail maintenance and enhancement," McCown said.

McCown said the Flint Hills Nature Trail has just been railbanked. It will be the second significant rail-trail in Kansas. It will stretch from Osawatimie to Harrington and will intersect with the Prairie Spirit Trail north of Ottawa.

When these trails will be completed is not yet known, he said.

There will be a grand opening ceremony at 9 a.m. March 30 in Garnett, beginning for the part of the Prairie Spirit Trail already complete.

Since sixth grade, K-State student's voice has been heard through the airwaves

STORY BY ABBI HAKE / PHOTOS BY CARY CONOVER

A sappy love song dies and a deep voice comes to life.

"Your station for continuous hits ... Power 94.5."

The man behind the voice then reaches for an orange button, and a new song begins.

Several nights a week, in the wee hours of the night, you'll hear his voice spill over the airwaves. The dominating, deep voice belongs to Jim Ford, senior in radio and television journalism.

Although he might be young, he's no rookie. He's been changing compact discs, moving dials and speaking into microphones for almost six years.

Ford's birth into the radio business came much earlier than that, though. He remembers it well.

His mother knew a man who read the news for KXLK-FM 105.3, a Wichita radio station. He offered to let Ford sit in on a news broadcast.

Ford, just a sixth-grader then, jumped at the idea. After sitting in on the news, they offered to let him read the weather on air.

He said he remembers his little hands shaking vigorously as he stood in front of the microphone reading nervously from a slip of paper, "FM 105, KXLK forecast: cloudy, windy and cool with the rain ending this morning."

There are no shaky hands now, though. Ford moves with ease within the brown-carpeted walls of the little broadcast room outside of Junction City.

Even as a junior high and high school student, Ford said he remembers spouting off long lines of disc jockey talk for the other kids in school. He said it was kind of a joke then.

His deep, loud, authoritative voice is a little more experienced now. It's quite distinctive.

"Personally, when I hear myself on tape, I scream. I don't care for it. I don't think it's the best voice in the world," Ford said.

People must like his voice, though. Ford has been hired by several fairly large radio stations in Manhattan and Wichita before he started work at KJCK-FM last September.

It takes more than a voice to make a good radio disc jockey, though.

Jim Ford, (below) senior in radio and television journalism, laughs at a joke told by another employee at KJCK-FM 94.5, where Ford works part-time. Ford (left) fades the sound level from one song to the next. He plays at least 80 songs a night.

"You've got to relate to the audience somehow. It can be hard at times, but it helps," Ford said.

Ford said he relates to his audience by talking about himself on air.

"I talk about my personal life. I throw in bits and pieces, like, 'I'm single and desperately looking,'" Ford said.

Because he's a student, Ford said he also talks about classes in an effort to form a bond with his Manhattan, K-State audience.

"I think listeners have problems in their lives ... they go through the same struggles in everyday life that I go through. I want to come off as a fairly human person."

As experienced as Jim Ford's voice is, he still looks to other radio personae for inspiration.

"Ever since I heard Casey Casem on KEYN in Wichita when I was 5 years old, I knew this is what I wanted to do," Ford said.

He's now doing exactly what he dreamed about as a child. It's getting tougher and tougher, though. Ford said he's been feeling the effects of his midnight to 6 a.m. shift.

He said he hopes his next job will not be an overnight shift.

With six hours of school, Ford said some mornings he has to spend the whole night at the station and then get up and go to school at 8:30 a.m.

"I'd like to get up at ten o'clock in the morning, come to work at 11, work through an afternoon shift, do production, and then go home."

During the night radio is a lot different than it is during the day. During the day, there are more commercials, more contests, more news and a lot more "office politics." Despite the fact that he'd probably be more busy, Ford said he's ready for a daytime shift.

Ford said he plans to stay in the radio business indefinitely. Although he's even thought about working with the production side of television, he will probably stay with the radio business because that is what he loves to do, and that's what he's loved since he was a kid.

"I eat, live and breathe radio. I love it."

CIVIL RIGHTS LECTURE

Harassment parallels racial discrimination

■ Speaker stresses understanding of sexual harassment

Laurel Howell
staff reporter

Racial and sexual harassment are motivated by the same reasons, said Camille Hébert, the third speaker in the Dorothy L. Thompson Civil Rights Lecture Series, Tuesday evening.

Hébert, K-State alumna and professor of law at Ohio State University, discussed how people think about sexual harassment and the difficulty they have seeing it as discrimination.

"No matter what the law says — and the law says sexual harassment is a form of discrimination — I think there is a sense that sexual harassment is not discrimination," Hébert said.

"Sexual harassment doesn't look like discrimination. People think it looks like normal social behavior," Hébert said.

People see it as behavior engage in with someone they like. It's hard for them to think about about that when speaking about discrimination, which is thought of as behavior you engage in with someone you hate, she said.

"The law says the same standards apply to both sexual and racial harassment," Hébert said.

"If someone asks for sex as a condition for keeping a job or obtaining a promotion, what is the motivation?" Hébert said. "Is this the way we treat someone we like?"

The answer is no.

"If we like someone and are trying to initiate a truly consensual romantic or even sexual relationship, that's not the way to go about it."

CAMILLE HÉBERT
SPEAKER

The context of the behavior is important in the determination of harassment, she said.

"Take the words, 'Will you sleep with me?' If those words are used in the context of a mutual loving relationship without coercion, we understand the implications of those words," Hébert said. "That's not sexual harassment."

"Let's utter those words in the context of a boss talking about his subordinates annual evaluation. Now those words look like love or even like, they look like coercion, humiliation, hate."

Hébert also used the phrase "I need some money" to illustrate her point.

"Between friends, those words can be a request for a gift or a loan. Give the person saying those words a gun or six friends around him in a dark alley or a piece of information

► TAIWAN PREPARES FOR DEFENSE AGAINST CHINESE MILITARY GAMES

TAIPEI, Taiwan (AP) — With a new round of Chinese war games opening Tuesday, Taiwanese troops on outlying islands reportedly took up positions to defend against a possible beach assault by mainland forces.

Taiwan's military refused to comment on the report by the China Times newspaper of preparations on Wuchiu, a Taiwanese island near China's coast that lies just 11 miles south of the zone of Chinese military exercises.

Hundreds of fishing boats fled the area of today's maneuvers, officials said.

China, with its show of military force in the days leading up to Taiwan's March 23 presidential elections, is trying to intimidate the Taiwanese into abandoning any aspirations for independence.

The military exercises beginning today take place in the Taiwan Straits, an 80-mile-wide channel that separates mainland China from Taiwan and go until March 25.

Another set of live-ammunition war games got under way in the straits last week, and were to end today.

► CLINTON CLASHES WITH GOP

WASHINGTON (AP) — Anticipating the long presidential election campaign, Republicans are blaming President Clinton, and Democrats are attacking GOP challenger Bob Dole for what looks to be a second year of stalemate in Congress.

"It would be tragic for the country if Senator Dole came back to the Congress and simply engaged in what went on in the first year of this Congress, which is basically gridlock and pushing an extreme agenda," White House chief of staff Leon Panetta said Sunday.

"Our position is to move legislation to the president," said House Majority Leader Dick Armey, R-Texas. "If he doesn't sign them, he'll have to deal with that when he deals with the American people out in the campaign."

Discord between the White House and the Republican-run Congress will be in full view Tuesday, when Clinton announces his $1.64 trillion budget for the 1997 fiscal year, which begins Oct. 1.

It is also sure to be on display as lawmakers take up yet another temporary spending bill needed to avoid a third partial government shutdown next weekend.

► BREEDER SELLS RARE POULTRY

WEBSTER CITY, Iowa (AP) — Murray McMurray counts his chickens before they are hatched. Then he counts them after.

It is all part of inventory at the nation's oldest and largest rare-breed hatchery, a mail-order business where the feathers fly on the assembly line as 1.5 million live chicks are sold each year to farms, zoos, ranches and other spots around the globe.

The Murray McMurray Hatchery produces and promotes, ships and sexes 105 kinds of poultry all from its humble headquarters in the heart of farm country.

"We have the rarest of the rare here," said Murray McMurray, whose Scottish grandfather founded the hatchery 69 years ago in this town, about an hour north of Des Moines.

McMurray sells chickens that trace their lineage to Spain (Blue Andalusians) and Sicily (Buttercups), hens that look like turkeys — the misbegotten-looking creatures are dubbed Transylvanian Naked Necks — and birds called Araucanas that produce green eggs (sorry, no ham).

► ANARCHY ENGULFS SERB CITY

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina (AP) — Arson fires raced through apartment buildings and warehouses alike as marauding Serbs laid waste to the district of Grbavica in an astonishing display of spite.

Anarchy reigned in Grbavica, the last of five Serb districts around Sarajevo to come under Muslim-Croat control on Tuesday.

The violence and destruction were reminiscent of the transfers of the other four districts — but much, much worse.

Fires engulfed Grbavica's main market, a food warehouse, and several apartment buildings still inhabited by Serbs as well as some Croat and Muslim families.

"I'm ashamed to say I'm a Serb when I see all this destruction and robbery," said a 71-year-old woman who gave her name as Nada.

LOS ANGELES (AP) — Jae Yul Kim welcomes customers to his South Central market with a smile and an ethnically correct greeting.

"Que pasa, amigo?" he asked a Hispanic man looking over the fresh hamburger, ribs and chicken wings.

"How are you doing?" he said to a black woman, who urged Kim to stock chicken-fried steak.

He promised to do so.

"The customer wants it, we order it," he told her.

Almost four years after the devastating 1992 riots, Kim and other Korean Americans in South Central have rebuilt their stores, but are still struggling to rebuild fragile relationships with their customers. Korean businesses suffered some of the worst looting and fire damage in the three days of rioting sparked by the acquittal of four white police officers charged in the beating of black motorist Rodney King. Fifty-five people were killed.

Property damage was estimated at $1 billion.

That Korean businesses were targeted reflected years of tension between shopkeepers and black customers.

Observers traced that tension to resentment poor blacks felt, thinking another immigrant group was passing them by on the way up the economic ladder, as well as to cultural traits that both sides misinterpreted as rude or insulting.

COMMENTARY

Campus lacks display facilities for artwork

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

Spaces for expression, whether they be interior or exterior, are vital to a university campus.

K-State is no exception. Exhibition space for art, architecture, or historical display can act as a respite for members of the K-State community — offering a place to relax, reflect and rejuvenate.

However, exhibition space on campus is becoming increasingly rare. As recently as spring 1995, student exhibition space decreased by two galleries.

McCain Auditorium no longer displays works of art in its lobby, and the Ambly Gallery, located in West Stadium, has been converted into studio space.

There are, basically, four main galleries for student use remaining on campus.

The Union Gallery, perhaps the most visited, is run by two committees: a committee facilitated by the art department and the Union Program Council Arts Committee. It is used for a wide range of exhibitions including student work, touring shows and juried exhibitions.

The Willard Gallery functions as the exhibition space of the art department and is used for BFA and MFA exhibitions and guest artists.

The Chang Gallery, located in Seaton Hall, is used by the architecture department for student displays, visiting architects and touring exhibitions.

The Diebler Gallery, located in West Stadium, is used by the art department for the exhibition of painting.

Margo Kren, professor of art and BFA exhibition coordinator, said the art department, while located in the old art building, which was demolished for the Farrell Library expansion, had a basement gallery called Gallery 6.

Kren said when the art department was relocated to Willard Hall, a classroom space was converted to create the Willard Gallery because there is a need for student exhibition space.

"We have a need to exhibit," Kren said. "We frequently take classes to the gallery, and it's nice to have it nearby — especially since we don't have a museum."

The Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art, now under construction on the southeast edge of campus, is scheduled to open in September 1996. The Museum will exhibit traveling exhibitions, works of art from the K-State collection and a faculty exhibition every other year.

Kren said the Willard Gallery is not very accessible to community members because it lacks nearby parking. "Students are already on campus and can go to it easily," Kren said. "You need it to be accessible to everyone."

Other than accessibility, Willard Gallery has other limitations.

"It's good for two-dimensional work, but we do need more wall-space," Kren said.

"We've always talked about walling the windows up," she said. "It's a lack of funding."

Space series

This is the third in a series of five articles concerning and evaluating different concepts of space on the K-State campus which will appear daily this week. Russell Fortmeyer is a junior in architectural engineering and an observer of campus planning, design and history.

Kren said long exposure of works of art to sunlight can damage them, but the amount of time most exhibitions are in the gallery will not cause any damage.

Willard Gallery is a basic four-wall classroom renovated as a gallery: black ceiling, accent lighting, carpeted walls and a tile floor.

"It's fairly all-purpose, as a space," Kren said.

Kren said there are limitations for what can be exhibited together because of the space.

"If two students exhibit together and one has very subtle, intimate work and the other has explosive, dynamic work — the one subtle artist can be drilled out of the room," she said.

"It's a matter of being inventive," Kren said. "You can bring folding screens out onto the floor to add more space, but that means you can't back up and look at the work on the wall easily."

Art galleries function on campus as spaces for reflection, escape and socializing.

"Sometimes art is an escape from the outside world," Kren said. "Other times art can throw you right back into it — it depends on the piece or the artist putting it up."

"The support of art has to do with what a culture expects and what they feel they cannot live without," she said. "A major art work can influence your life in a major way. You have a chance to see who you are by going to exhibitions."

Rhonda Bathurst, senior in art, created her own gallery at her home in order to allow more opportunity for younger artists to exhibit their work.

Bathurst said she likes exhibiting at her home because it has many nooks and crannies which create a more interesting atmosphere.

"You can't get different spaces like that on campus," she said.

Bathurst said when she hangs shows she considers everything about the exhibition environment.

"Everything is completely related to the environment you're in — colors, line quality and texture," she said.

"Everything can't stand alone," Bathurst said. "Everything's interdependent on the environment."

Not all art can be displayed indoors, which is why many works dot campus lawns.

Although the space west of West Stadium, used to exhibit student sculpture, is adjacent to the sculpture studios, the most public interaction it encourages is for people driving by on Denison Avenue.

GARY CONOVER/Collegian

To the west of West Stadium, art is displayed in the student sculpture garden. Though it is not as centrally located as some of the indoor galleries on campus, it is designated as a student exhibition space.

"I think there's potential to display more student sculpture across campus," Bathurst said.

Rex Replege, associate professor of art, coordinates the student sculpture garden near West Stadium. He said this area has been designated for a number of years as a student exhibition space.

Replege said he would not be opposed to displaying student sculpture across campus, but no one had ever considered it.

"We don't produce a lot of work in our program that is large-size, outdoor work," he said.

Replege said most of the outdoor art on campus was created by students during a summer workshop.

To meet some demand for space of expression, students used the construction wall surrounding Farrell Library as a palate — until it was torn down prior to Family Weekend in spring 1995.

Richard Martin, director of McCain, said the reason art will no longer be displayed in the lobby is because of maintenance problems.

"It's a very public space," Martin said. "Damage to the walls has to be taken into consideration."

Martin said the issue of maintenance and the issue of scheduling were reasons contributing to the policy change.

"At least in the very near future, we will not show student work," he said.

COLLEGIAN Opinion

The tale of the little health center that couldn't

QUICKread

► When it comes time for elections, just remember the senators who put Lafene in a position to have to cut the number of doctors and operating hours.

Gather 'round, students, and we will tell you a tale. A tale of idiocy, short-sightedness and regret. For this is the tale of "Little Lafene Health Center and the Big Bad Student Senate."

Once upon a time, in a land not far away, there was a little clinic named Lafene Health Center. It was a fine little clinic, adequately serving the needs of the students of the campus. Oh, it certainly had its faults and drawbacks — every little student health center does — but for the most part, it was a good health center.

Then one day, along came the Big Bad Student Senate. The senate looked at the health center's operating reserves and said, "Oh no! You have far too many gold pieces in your treasury! We must remedy that!"

So the senate waved its magic wand, reduced the income of the health center to 70 gold pieces and said, "Now you must operate off the reserves and use the reserve up."

It had no choice but to dutifully go about its business, paying part of its household bills out of the reserve of gold.

And so it came to pass the gold reserve was gone, and the health center went to the senate to beg for more gold pieces.

"Oh please, I have spent all of my reserve as you have asked and have no more. And what little gold you do send me is not enough to pay my household bills! Please give me 105 gold pieces, so that I may adequately serve the students!"

But the senate did not want to give the health center any more money. And what was more, the senate was fearful of the wrath of the Great Wizard Peterson. For Peterson threatened to cast an evil veto spell if the senate dared to give the little health center any more gold. (This was because Peterson had risen to power on a foolish campaign platform of "no new gold expenditures.")

So the senate said to the health center, "No, you may not have any more gold. You must make do with the 70 gold pieces we already give you."

"But that is not enough to cover my household expenses!" exclaimed the health center.

"Tough dragon livers," replied the senate.

"But please! How shall I serve the students if I do not have 105 pieces of gold?" cried the health center. "I beg of you, please do not harm the students this way!"

"Oh, all right, I'll give you 83 pieces of gold. But that's it."

And so the health center took the 83 gold pieces, grateful for that pittance, even though it knew it would not cover expenses adequately.

The health center then sadly set about the unpleasant task of slashing its programs, for because of the selfishness of the senate, it could no longer fully serve its students.

Students began to notice the lack of funding soon, when healers and staff were let go. When students tried to make appointments, they were told that there were no appointments available, because hours and staff had been cut and fewer students could be served.

"I'm sorry," the health center told a young woman with a learning disability.

"But I can no longer help you. The senate has refused to fund me."

"You must go elsewhere," said the health center to a student with a physical disability. "I can no longer help you, either."

A young man in for an x-ray was told, "I am sorry, but I must charge you 18 percent more for these tests now than before."

And on and on.

Now students, we wish that we could tell you this story had a happy ending. But no one lived happily ever after. However, we hope you remember the moral of this story: When you need health care from Lafene, and it is not available or is expensive, you know who to blame.

Student Senate.

► STEREOTYPING AND RACISM NOT THE SAME

Editor,

I am writing in response to Eric Waters' March 15 column.

While I am in agreement with some points he hits on, I feel he has fallen into the same trap as many others have when addressing issues on racism. Once again, another brave writer has taken up the fight of explaining ignorance only to cover behind big brother racism.

While I agree unfair stereotyping and discrimination are prevalent, I do not believe this constitutes racism. I write only in response to Waters and do not assume anyone else reasons as he does.

I am concerned with the ease he links stereotyping to racism. For someone who professes to be going to school to broaden his mind, I was shocked at his failure to distinguish between stereotyping and racism. Perhaps the linkage of stereotyping to racism was unintentional, however, in one short passage in his article he equates the two as one.

I would not have taken offense at all to the column if he had not made this equation. However, he did, and I feel it is systematic in arguments made pertaining to race relations. Systematic in the sense that anytime there is a misunderstanding, or a difference of opinion, immediately the racism word is thrown out. I feel that this is the proverbial cop out for not understanding why misconceptions exist. The fact that someone stereotypes others does not make them a racist.

I will not pretend I am free of stereotypical behavior as Waters has. I confess to holding dogmatic views of young black males and all other members of society. And that includes members of my own race. I feel anyone who says they do not hold stereotypes is either lying or really hasn't examined themselves very closely.

Stereotyping is an unavoidable and necessary element of human survival. It only becomes racism when it reaches the point of absolutism. I admit to making unfair judgments about people, but they are always from personal experience. I resent the accusation that stereotyping only exists because of misrepresentation in the media. You may find the answer to life's problems on television, but I do not.

I base my stereotypes of people on actual life experience. Now that I have confessed to the awful crime of learning through experience, I will also point out that I can unlearn from experience. It is only those who cannot unlearn their prejudicial views that even approach racism.

In his column, Waters casually asserts that stereotyping and racism are one and the same thing. I think everyone can admit to having prejudicial views, but that does not make a person a racist. As Waters points out, prejudice stems from ignorance. Or it can stem from the truth. Whatever the case may be most of us are smart enough and flexible enough to change our views when reality clashes with our prejudice.

However, the fact that I may hold certain misconceptions of entire races does not mean I assert that my race is naturally superior to all others. That and only that, is racism. This is the accusation Waters seems to make when he slyly replaces the word stereotype with racism.

Those are strong accusations. Accusations that by your own logic, also implement you as a racist. For you are also guilty of stereotyping in your assertion that many students misjudge you just because you're black. Have you ever considered that it may be a personal character flaw? Perhaps they just don't like you because you're you. Sure stereotypes exist. That's life. You know you're guilty of them, too. How can you expect others to rid themselves of stereotypes when you can't admit you hold them? It's time to stop hiding behind that word racism. You wondered what it would be like if everyone were colorless. How would we base our judgments? I do not know on what our judgments would be based, but you can rest assured judgments would still exist. And you would be out of excuses.

► KANSAS KIDS DON'T GET EQUAL EDUCATION

Editor,

How can the Collegian, in supporting qualified admissions standards, be so pompous as to believe each Kansas kid receives the same quality family upbringing that encourages getting a good education? There are many less fortunate kids who will be denied access to universities they pay taxes to support if the qualified admissions bill is passed.

Everyone has a right to try to attain an education. Some of us have it easier than others because we had parents who prepared meals for us and who made us do our homework. But there are many who do not. Why make it harder on those who already have it hard?

It's that same Republican, elitist feeling that the riffraff who aren't "one of us" should be excluded from participating in society. Should we not want to help those who are less fortunate to better themselves and become productive members of society?

Kansas is not living in the Stone Age just because we do not have qualified admissions standards. On the contrary, I believe Kansas to be the only state with common sense and compassion toward its citizens with regard to this issue. I hope the Collegian rethinks its position, and I hope our state senators do not follow the House's lead on this proposal and do not support qualified admissions.

► COLUMN STEREOTYPED WHITE PEOPLE

Editor,

I was appalled to read Eric Waters' column in Thursday's Collegian. He seems to be generalizing white people the way he claims we do to black people. My first problem is with the statement, "If a student sees a black male, they automatically perceive him to be an athlete." Sorry, you are mistaken. I am a student, and I certainly don't feel that way.

He later went on to state in a matter-of-fact manner that the newspaper printed a detailed account of a rape just because the attacker was black. Thank you for asserting your opinion as fact, Eric. He goes on to say the reason a female was avoiding him was his color. It is entirely possible she would do the same if he was white. I would encourage a woman to be cautious when she is alone at night, regardless of anybody else's ethnicity.

I agree, it is past time to stop stereotyping young black males, but get the facts straight before you go around accusing people of racism, instead of basing your column on your own opinions of personal accounts. There are two sides to the racism coin, pal.

All of the young black males I know are fun to be around and don't deserve the labels others sometimes give them.

There are times, in fact, that I am ashamed to be a member of my race because of some of the things my fellow caucasians say. However, I don't stereotype black men, and I'm sure there are plenty of whites like me. Perhaps we can minimize racism in our country when we stop unjustly pointing fingers.

► ARGUMENTS ABOUT SATIRE'S LACK FUNNY

Editor,

In a letter published in Monday's Collegian, Derek Tuttle accuses Jason Hamilton's writing of lacking satirical bite.

This may be true. Luckily for mirth-starved readers, Tuttle's arguments for his position are laughable.

First, Tuttle complains that while Swift proposed impossible measures (the eating of babies), Hamilton is proposing possible measures (the privatization of the University).

In fact, babies are easier to kill than most livestock. The reason we don't eat babies is not because it is impossible, but because it is immoral. Hamilton's point is that while we could privatize the University, to do so would be wrong because it would deprive many deserving students of the opportunity to receive an education.

Next, Tuttle draws our attention to the benefits of a private university education. No doubt these benefits are real, but one wonders why he is not attending one of those excellent private institutions. Perhaps, like most of us, he can't afford to.

Does he believe that the higher wages which accompany prestigious degrees are deserved only by those who can afford to purchase a better brand of education than that available at K-State? How are they supposed to afford the best education if they are not already well-off? What is it about purchasing power that makes a person deserve a better education, better health care, nicer cars, a bigger house or a better life?

Tuttle does not address these difficult questions. Instead he offers a platitude. "Consumers," Tuttle tells us, "must use discretion in a world of limited resources."

Certainly they must. Hopefully the profit-minded free enterprise crowd will use discretion too. But I wouldn't count on it.

WILLIAM THOMAS
Burdette

But really, this is ridiculous.

Pat Buchanan? OK, I am conservative, but I am not Genghis Khan. Everyone else has pretty much bailed, so that leaves Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan.

I used to like Dole. I used to think he was the best man for the job, but the more I see, hear, read about or think about him, I find he is just an old fart without a clue as to what is going on outside Washington. Sure he can get a lot done on the hill. A lot of people owe him favors. He knows how to play the game, but do you think this guy can carry on a coherent conversation with anyone under the age of 60 who is not a lawyer or politician?

I happen to think the ability to relate to people and do what is best for them is a bit more important in a president than the ability to act like a politician.

Dole either dodges questions, or he just does not get them. Either way that scares me. If he cannot answer a question because he is afraid of his image, that is bad. If he cannot understand the question because it comes from a voter who was not around to vote for Lincoln, then we have a real problem.

Dole is the oldest man ever to run for the presidency, and he is almost dead. I do not mean dead in the literal sense, but he just does not seem to have much personality. President Reagan — now he had personality.

Dole makes even Reagan look young. Reagan was only four years younger than Dole, but he had a sense of humor and the ability to make people think he understood the question. All Dole has is a confused look on his face.

It is not the actual age that is a problem, it is how old you act. Look at Clinton. He obviously could have benefited from a few more years of wisdom under his belt. Perhaps it would give him a bit more credibility.

I think older people can teach us young whippersnappers a lot — if they can understand us.

If I could have a conversation with Dole, I would say, "Get some charisma. You are running for the highest office in the greatest nation in the world, and you cannot show a little excitement? You look mean, confused or bored. Take some lessons from either Reagan or my grandpa."

My grandpa is older than 70, but he can still carry on an intelligent conversation with me. He makes me laugh, but he also has a lot of good insight to give. He has war stories and love stories. Heck, he even has a story about how my grandma once scared a grizzly bear up a tree with a frying pan and a wooden spoon.

Can you see Elizabeth Dole doing that? Can you even see Bob Dole telling the story in his monotone drone?

In fact, I think I will form my own political party and give my grandpa the nomination. He has everything I want in a president. He has charisma, he presents himself well, he is decisive and he has good Christian values. He knows about the history of our nation, and he is always ready to take a stand on issues — something all politicians could take a cue from.

My other grandpa has the administrative skills it takes to run the nation. He was a vice president in a large corporation. He knows his finances, and he is great with foreign policy. He has all sorts of stories to tell about the eight years he spent in Saudi Arabia. He too has good values.

And both of them are still sharp enough to relate to me. They both understand the issues plaguing my generation. Does Bob Dole? He sure does not act like it. If he does understand, he has a lot to prove between now and November.

What a team my grandpas could make. President and vice president. One would think the rest of the United States could produce two candidates half as worthy of the nomination.

City plants 250 trees yearly

Residents can ask city to plant trees in city-owned areas, yards

Kris Bethea
staff reporter

Trees, trees and more trees. The city of Manhattan plants more than 250 trees within city limits each year. "Manhattan is a member of Tree City USA," said J. David Mattox, forestry supervisor for the city of Manhattan Forestry Department. "We plant anywhere from 250 to 300 trees every year in city parks and on city property." All trees are planted within city limits, Mattox said. "These trees are to help Global Relief," Mattox said. "We're using trees to create shade, to help water vapor and to reduce the thermal heating in urban areas," he said. The bulk of the trees are planted by only three people, he said. "I do the site selection," Mattox said. "They just dig the hole and plant the trees," Mattox said. "We follow behind him planting the trees where he has staked them," said Jim Cutright, maintenance worker for the city forestry department. Before completing a site selection, Mattox goes out and does a site inspection. "I look at the species of other trees in the area," Mattox said. "We try to keep the number of one species down." The first thing Mattox said he looks at when determining a site is whether any trees were removed from that area. "Generally speaking, we replace everything we remove," Mattox said. Trees can be removed because of age or because of diseases, Mattox said. "We just completed checking on the trees planted last year," Cutright said. "Only three out of around 300 are dead." Mattox also looks at underground and overhead utilities. "We don't want to plant a large tree under a power line," Mattox said. Mattox has developed a list of trees over the years that he uses for this project. He still tries new trees. "Some work, some don't," Mattox said. There are about 14 species of trees that work. Mattox said he picks trees from three sizes at maturity: small, medium and large.

The Red Bud is an example of a small tree, Red Maple is an example of a medium-sized tree and Red Oak is an example of a large-sized tree. The cost of each tree is about $50. The total amount being spent this year is less than $8,400, Mattox said. The trees are funded by the city of Manhattan. "We try to get a good price on trees," Mattox said. Citizens of Manhattan are able to apply for trees for their yards. It must be in the city-owned areas of yards. The area is called the city street right-of-way, Mattox said. "It is the part of the yard that is between the sidewalk and the street. This piece of property belongs to the city," he said. "A form comes out in the Manhattan Mercury every Sunday during March," Mattox said.

People can fill out this form and if Mattox decides that the area needs a tree, he places a stake in the spot the tree will go. Then the men come and plant the tree, Mattox said. Mattox said they leave a flier on the door saying the resident can use the water hydrant and their hose for the first watering. "We ask them to keep an eye on it," Mattox said. "And let us know if it is being chewed on or looking diseased." Otherwise, the trees grow on their own, Mattox said. "This project takes quite a bit of time," Mattox said. Mattox said it is very labor intensive. Depending on the weather, we can be finished within three weeks to one month, Cutright said. "I call it a labor of love," Mattox said.

PAIN KILLER.

For fast relief from the nagging ache of taxes, we recommend TIAA-CREF SRAs. SRAs are tax-deferred annuities designed to help build additional assets—money that can help make the difference between living and living well after your working years are over.

Contributions to your SRAs are deducted from your salary on a pretax basis. That lowers your current taxable income, so you start saving on federal and, in most cases, state and local income taxes right away. What's more, any earnings on your SRAs are also tax deferred until you receive them as income. That can make a big difference in how painful your tax bill is every year.

As the nation's largest retirement system, based on assets under management, we offer a wide range of allocation choices—from the TIAA Traditional Annuity, which guarantees principal and interest (backed by the company's claims-paying ability), to TIAA-CREF's diversified variable annuity accounts. And our expenses are very low,* which means more of your money goes toward improving your future financial health.

Red Raiders,
Red Raiders,
send your best right over

It all comes down to one little piece of shattered glass.

That one piece of glass signifies what K-State has to fear next season. And take it from me, the K-State basketball team should be scared right out of its purple gym shorts.

Too bad the Wildcats lost in the first round of the NCAA Tournament, or they would have been able to see what I saw. I was able to stay until Sunday's contest and watch the most exciting game of the regional.

No, it was not Georgetown beating up on New Mexico. Actually, I am pretty positive if our Cats had pulled their heads out of the Virginia sand and taken it to the Lobos, they would have had a great shot at upsetting the Hoyas. But as it turned out, New Mexico fell at the hands of hometown-like officiating.

No, it was the Red Raiders of Texas Tech who provided the most exciting game of the Eastern regional. How, you might say? They tried everything. No, they did everything.

Myview

SHANA
Newell

I am sure many of you have seen it on ESPN a thousand times over, but here is my rendition.

Senior Darvin Ham, a 6-foot-7 forward/center, provided the flame that sparked the Richmond Coliseum into an uproar (and a 39 minute delay).

With 12:06 remaining in the first half and the Tarheels ahead 16-14, Ham snagged an offensive rebound after a missed Jason Sasser hook shot and driving up the middle, pounded the ball into the basket. He not only pounded the holy snickers out of that ball, but in the process pounded the holy milky way out of the backboard.

Glass shattering all around him, Ham just walked to the side of the court as he was almost tackled by his teammates. North Carolina players just laughed and smiled with disbelief. The entire coliseum stood, applauded and cheered.

One of the sportswriters from a local newspaper who was sitting next to me suggested I go grab a few pieces of the shattered backboard.

I thought about it, then decided I would probably not get the chance to see something like that in person again. So, I walked out on the court before they started cleaning up and snatched a few pieces of the glass. I was looking at one of them while the event staff was changing the backboard and it got me thinking.

That piece of glass symbolized the downfall of North Carolina right there, and perhaps the up and coming dominance of Red Raider basketball. Maybe even Big 12 basketball. And then I started to realize, K-State just might be in trouble.

The basket tied the game and when it finally resumed, it was a whole new ball game (only with 12:06 minutes in the first half instead of 20.) That shattered backboard gave Texas Tech a momentum that I think they found hard to lose in the second half.

The Red Raiders dominated the second half, and it was all the Tar Heels could do to stay in the game.

After the game, Ham said all he wanted to do was show his strength.

"I wasn't really caught up in the moment of breaking the backboard, I was just feeling so good and ready to play that I wanted to run around the court and jump up and down and do some flips," he said. "I really didn't realize what I did until I turned back and looked at the rim. Sasser was giving me chest bumps, and I just wanted to flex."

In fact, Sasser was having visions of ESPY awards floating through his head.

"The first thing that went through my mind was that I missed a shot. Then I saw Darvin flying through the air and the glass shattered," he said. "The next thing that went through my mind was 'ESPY.' Even though Darvin had the big dunk, they were still going to have to show my missed hook."

Ham finished the game with 14 points. He was one of five players who reached double-figures for the Red Raiders.

So, you say? He's a senior. Four of their five starters were seniors. What damage is Texas Tech going to do to our Wildcats next year?

I will tell you. Cory Carr, sophomore, finished with 19 points, 6-of-12 from the field and 4-of-9 behind the arc.

Sophomore center Tony Battie had 16 points against the Tar Heels. Not only that, he grabbed a game-high 14 rebounds, and 13 of them were defensive.

With Carr and Battie leading the Red Raiders, the Southern Division of the Big 12 just might have its version of powerhouse Kansas. The Red Raiders have lost only one game this season. With a 30-1 record heading into the Sweet 16, that only loss came against Eastern Michigan.

I do not know about you, but the Red Raiders would make me jump out of my purple gym shorts.

Wide receivers Kevin Lockett and J.W. Wight — it's been almost three months since they played together in the Holiday Bowl in San Diego.

Both are starters as they face each other across ... the grey rubber of the basketball court?

Lockett and Wight, starters for Faber College and Purple Helmets, were among eight members of the Wildcat football players in the intramural independent championship game at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. Purple Helmets won the title 51-44 and will advance to the all-University championships.

Lockett, the only football player on Faber's roster, said he preferred to be on a team without the other players.

"I don't want to play with them," he said. "I knew a lot of these other guys from playing here at the rec, and I decided to play with them."

Lockett led Faber's early barrage, scoring eight points in the first half. Faber leaped to a 7-3 lead and held on to take a 25-24 lead into the break.

But the second half was more the Helmets' type of game. The inside play of Justin Swift and Jarrett Grossdidier (also football players) and the outside shooting of Keith Sides, senior in secondary education, powered them to a 48-38 lead in the final minute of the game.

"I think we got a little tired toward the end of the game," Lockett said. "And they're such a physical team. They just didn't let us get our legs."

What the Helmets did give Faber is a chance, hitting just three of their first 16 free throws in the second half. Chad Wolf, graduate student in industrial engineering, nailed a 3-pointer to close the gap to three, 47-44.

Sides, the only non-football player on the Helmets' roster, tallied nine second-half points. He finished with 11 points.

Wight said the players needed a point guard, so they recruited Sides.

"We have a lot of bangers inside and went and got the best point guard in the business," he said.

All of the members of the football team play offense.

"We beat the defense last night," Wight said.

Wight led all scorers with 14 points. Justin Heider, sophomore in pre-health, and Lockett paced Faber with 13 points each.

Cowboys ride into town to try to lasso Wildcats' sluggersJohn Berggren
staff writer

The K-State baseball team will put its 13-6 record up against one of the top teams in the conference in Oklahoma State (17-5). The Wildcats open Big 8 play with a double-header starting at noon today.

With the temperature predicted to reach only the mid-40s, K-State baseball coach Mike Clark said the Cats might have somewhat of an advantage over the Cowboys.

"I don't think we'll be affected any more than they will," Clark said.

"If anything, it should be to our advantage because they shouldn't be used to playing in the cold weather coming from down south."

Oklahoma State won the Big 8 title a year ago. It lost 15 lettermen from that team, 14 of whom signed professionally. Oklahoma State is already 5-0 in the Big 8 with three wins over Iowa State and two wins over Missouri this year.

Even with the loss of players from last year, Clark said Oklahoma State was still as strong as ever.

"They're 17-5 and are averaging 13 runs a ball game," Clark said.

"All of their losses have come against quality teams and they seem like the same strong Oklahoma State team as always."

K-State comes into the game averaging 10 runs a ball game, and Cat hurlers are pitching at a 4.73 ERA, yet Clark said his team would have to be on top of its game to beat Oklahoma State.

"You can't put yourself in holes against a team like Oklahoma State," Clark said. "We can't have errors and we've got to have base runners if we want to win."

"We're still in the first third of the season, and we're working with (shortstop) Heath Schesser and (second baseman) Scott Poepard," he said.

"They've sat back on some balls they should have been aggressive with. As long as we see daily improvement, we'll be fine."

Probable starting pitchers for K-State today will be Eric Yanz in the first game and Matt Koeman in the second game.

Yanz is coming off a rocky outing against Regis. He came on after starter Kevin Wicker and relievers Jason Wells and Marc Lowery all struggled from the mound.

Yanz worked 1-2/3 innings and gave up four runs on four hits and a walk.

Clark said Yanz's last appearance did not worry him.

"He wasn't even supposed to pitch in that game," Clark said. "He had to come on and get warm in the middle of the game on short notice."

"He's thrown extremely well for us and before that he had been phenomenal. From the starting standpoint, he'll do a good job. He hasn't had a bad start yet."

Koeman comes into the second game with a 3-1 record and has a 3.32 ERA.

As K-State's ace starter, Koeman has 32 strikeouts in 38 innings pitched, while giving up only 11 walks.

Freshman intends to return to Big Dance in '97

Life can deal people strange hands at times.

The dealer has handed K-State freshman Shawn Rhodes his share of bum cards. But Rhodes just keeps playing.

Growing up as an only child, he did not really plan to play basketball. "I really wanted to play baseball," Rhodes said.

"But when I got into high school, I just kept growing. Eventually I outgrew baseball, so I played basketball."

Rhodes said his parents were the main reason he has ended up where he is today.

"My parents were really good at taking me to games and out to play catch or shoot horse and stuff," he said. "I've just always really liked sports."

A 6-foot-10 forward/center for K-State, Rhodes found himself filling in for junior Gerald Eaker several times this season.

One of his biggest games came in the K-State win at Iowa State late in the season. That win strengthened K-State NCAA Tournament hopes.

Against the Cyclones, Rhodes shot a career-high 18 points. In 40 minutes played, he shot 7-of-14 from the field, including 3-of-7 from three-point land. He also snagged seven rebounds, one assist, two steals and a blocked shot.

Rhodes was a large part of the mechanics that found K-State in Virginia for the East Regional of the NCAA Tournament last Friday. But little did Rhodes know he would not take part in the Cats' final game of the season.

"I woke up at around 6:45 that morning and felt kind of sick," he said.

"I went to the bathroom, hoping I would feel better, but I just kept getting sick. And then I threw up, and I knew it was bad. I mean, I haven't gotten the flu bad enough to be sick in like 10 years."

Rhodes said he laid down for a while, trying to kick the stomach pains, but by the time his roommate, sophomore Aaron Swartzendruber, left for breakfast about 10, it was evident Rhodes most likely would not be playing.

"Right before he went out to eat, and I think he heard me throwing up in the bathroom, and he told me 'Oh, no.' And right then I knew I wasn't going to be able to play," Rhodes said.

After conferring with the trainer, Rhodes said they sent him to the hospital.

"One of the main reasons I went to the hospital was to get an IV, to try to get some fluids in me," he said.

"Then they started to wonder if it was appendicitis, so then they took my white blood cell count. Something about it made them think that it might be appendicitis."

But the hospital would not release Rhodes until the surgeon on duty was able to visit with him.

"But the surgery he was in ran long," Rhodes said. "By the time he was able to check me out, I knew I probably wasn't going to be able to play."

Rhodes' doctor diagnosed his symptoms as simply a virus of some sort and sent Rhodes back to the team's hotel.

Because the game was in Virginia, local television stations were airing the Maryland game. Rhodes was not only unable to play, but he was also unable to watch the rest of his team play without him.

"We kept watching the scores on Headline News," he said.

"Everything looked fine for a while, and I thought we were doing pretty good. ESPN showed some highlights during halftime, and I thought we looked fine. But then the score just kept getting worse."

But while Rhodes said he was disappointed he was not able to play, his biggest concern was his parents.

"I just felt bad for them, I really did," he said. "I mean, they bought the tickets and flew all the way out to Virginia and then they didn't even get to see the tournament. I feel really bad for them."

But not for himself?

"Oh, sure, I was upset. But I knew there was pretty much nothing I could do about it. There's next year," Rhodes said. "We've got a sophomore class that's pretty strong, and we've also got good juniors in Aaron (Swartzendruber) and Mark (Young). We've also got great seniors in Gerald (Eaker) and Johnnie (Williams)."

"The tournament was a great experience for us. We've seen what it's like and we've been there. We've played with the excitement," he said.

"Now that we've seen it, we're going to want to go back. I'm sure we're going to work hard and do the things we need to do to make it there."

Board questions Collegian editor's work

■ Board denies public access to discussions of Marlett's attitude, authority

Laurel Howell
staff reporter

The Board of Student Publications met Monday night to discuss in executive session the employment status of Mike Marlett, editor in chief of the Collegian.

Lin Bliss moved that the board go into executive session for 20 minutes with only members of the board and the three directors present. Marlett requested the executive session be made public, however the board voted 5-1 to close the meeting.

The Collegian was denied access to the executive session because of the Kansas Open Meeting Act. The act says that any meeting may be closed when discussing employment status of non-elected personnel.

"From my perspective it was a discussion situation. It's also my understanding that this topic was discussed at last Thursday's personnel committee meeting when the editor, and I, and the (Royal Purple) adviser and the (Royal Purple) editor were all out of town," said Ron Johnson, Collegian news adviser and ex-officio member of the board. "The first time we knew this was going to happen was when we read the e-mail agenda Monday afternoon."

After 20 minutes, the meeting was opened to discuss other business. Then Lin Bliss moved to re-enter the executive session with the board, the directors and Marlett. The decision was made to re-convene the open meeting in 30 minutes.

At the second executive session, the board discussed Marlett's conduct as editor in chief of the Collegian.

"We have a confrontation between the editor of the Collegian and what he thinks he has a right to do and board members who wish to control the policies of the organization, and they both have rights here," Johnson said.

Marlett said the board said in executive session he did not attend board meetings to its satisfaction.

Marlett said he tried to attend as many meetings as possible. Often meetings were scheduled during Collegian staff meetings or during his class time.

He said he has attended more than half the meetings, and he attended more than some board members.

An editorial published by the editorial board on March 1 stated the Collegian press run would be cut to 7,500 if the Student Publications Inc. fee were not increased. It also said that members of the editorial board had considered cutting the press run to show the students what a reduced press run would be like.

The board said cutting the press run should have been its decision, and it had not stated it would cut the press run if the fee increase did not pass.

The board said the Collegian staff did not have the authority to make the decision, and the editorial made it sound as if it did.

Marlett said the editorial listed a figure of 7,500 papers because that was the figure given to the paper by Johnson.

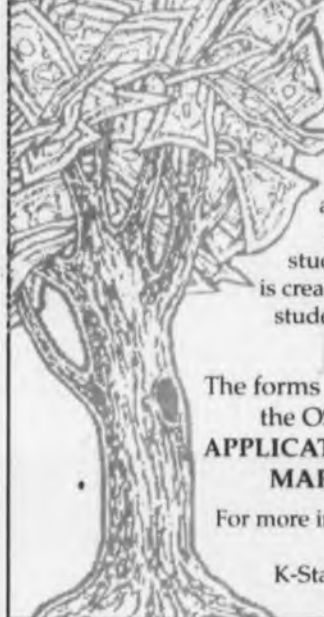

"That's correct," Johnson said. "If my memory serves me correctly, that is a number that I referred to in a Senate Privilege Fee Committee meeting."

"I don't really think the Collegian did anything wrong in reporting that. They have every right to do that," he said. "They were doing their jobs as journalists, trying to get to the root of the problem."

Marlett said he consulted several people concerning the decision to cut the press run and decided not to do so, in part, because he felt he did not have the authority.

The board said Marlett also did not complete work that they asked him to do. Specifically, he did not meet deadlines or did not complete work requested of him at all. In addition, they said his attitude toward the board was belligerent.

K-State Parachute Club offers classes, thrills

by Bill Bontempo

From the time you let go of the airplane until the few seconds later when your parachute opens, there is nothing but complete silence. It is a lot like those few seconds before an inevitable car wreck when you feel like your whole life passes before your eyes. When your parachute opens, it is like your only friend. Once it is deployed, you achieve the very unnatural act of human flight.

The K-State Parachute Club has about 15 members who seek this experience on a regular basis. They encourage and train others to join them in the skydiving experience.

Bill Dawes, associate professor of electrical and computer engineering, owns Dawes Aviation at the Wamego airport and allows the club to use his Cessna 182 airplane for its jumps.

Chris Leech, president of the club, said it trains about 80 new jumpers each semester. Last weekend there were about 15 people signed up to make their first skydive with the club.

The club is classified as a community club, so anyone in the Manhattan area is welcome to join.

Classes are taught by experienced skydivers from the club who take the time to ensure that new jumpers are ready for the thrill of jumping out of a plane from 3,000 feet in the air.

The training starts with classroom and video instruction on Friday night and concludes Saturday morning with hands-on experience with the plane, landing techniques and practice in a training harness made to simulate an actual parachute.

During the training, a new jumper learns how to arch the body for stability in the air, how to operate the opened parachute and how to deploy the reserve in case the main chute malfunctions.

The reserve parachute is important, but usually not deployed in modern skydiving.

"The newer equipment is so much more reliable that it greatly reduces the risk of a reserve ride," Leech said.

Tarl Karoleski, of Bravo Company 1st Engineer Battalion at Fort Riley, had 37 prior jumps, but needed the training because it had been too long since his last jump.

Karoleski said he had a good impression of the training and the overall operation of the parachute club.

"It's very professional. It was nice. They covered everything," he said. "As a student drop zone, it's one of the best I've seen as far as getting people interested in the sport."

Once training is complete the thrills begin for everyone at the drop zone as new skydivers descend from 3,000 feet with shrieks of joy, excitement and the elation of a successful parachute deployment.

"It was the biggest adrenaline rush you could possibly imagine," said Ricky Jones, part-time student taking nutrition science at K-State.

Jones said he was drawn to sky-

BIRDS OF A FEATHER

He is a strong supporter of labor unions and the Catholic Church. His militant stand on abortion has put fear into the hearts of abortion rights advocates.

And he is not even running for the Republican presidential nomination. He is going to jail.

John Salvi III was convicted in Dedham, Mass. of two counts of first-degree murder and five counts of attempted murder.

He committed the offenses during an abortion clinic shooting rampage in Brookline, Mass.

Hey, wait a minute...

Salvi believes there is a worldwide conspiracy to undermine the Catholic Church; Pat Buchanan believes Christian and especially Catholic morals are being systematically attacked by the media and the federal government.

SCOTT ALLEN Miller

Salvi supports the labor movement in much the same way that many Catholics did in the first half of this century.

Buchanan has been a critic of labor unions in the past, but is now seeking their support in his bid for the White House.

Salvi disagrees with abortion so much he shot the daylight out of a couple of women's clinics, killing a few people.

Buchanan has never done that, but he has never been critical of such behaviors, either.

Vice President Salvi. Kind of has a nice, eerie ring to it, doesn't it?

It could not happen, though. Salvi is in jail for the rest of his life and any good politician has to be able to evade prosecution. Besides, Salvi has claimed to be pro-welfare state, which means compared to Buchanan, Salvi is a liberal.

SO MUCH FLAME-RETARDANT CLOTHING

Cruising for hookers in one town just got easier.

The police in Costa Mesa, Calif., have begun impounding the clothing of prostitutes after they arrest them.

The prostitutes are then released back to the streets wearing paper jumpsuits.

A police spokesperson said the department is hoping the time it takes to change into new clothes, the expense of the new clothes and the humiliation of walking around in paper clothing will deter prostitutes from street walking.

Think again, donut gut.

It used to be difficult to distinguish the prostitutes from the other trashily dressed people on California streets. In Costa Mesa, all you have to do now is look out for the women in paper.

Johns and prostitutes do not even have to make verbal offers of money for sex anymore.

diving by his nature and after his first jump, he was not disappointed.

"If you've got any sense of adventure, it's just one of those things you've got to do," he said.

"I'll be doing it again as many times as I can," he said.

While not all the jumpers are new to the sport, the drop zone offers skydiving for all levels of experience.

New jumpers use a static line between the plane and the parachute, which automatically deploys the parachute when the line is tight.

After five static line jumps, parachutists can freefall from a higher altitude and deploy their own chutes.

Freefall is the type of skydive Adam Smith, junior in animal science and industry, is looking forward to.

Smith was at the drop zone last weekend for his fourth jump and ready to make the transition to freefall.

"The most exciting part is when you're out there on that wing," he said.

"You can explain it, but it doesn't do it justice," Smith said.

Smith came out with some friends for his first jump last semester, and while his friends have not returned to jump, he plans on skydiving for a long time.

"I plan on trying to do it every nice day we got," he said.

For some of the more experienced skydivers, the Parachute Club offers a chance to showcase their talents in national competition.

David Peuster, instructor and jump master, has more than 600 jumps and has been involved with the club on and off through the years.

Peuster, who was a gear officer in 1986 and club president in 1987, said the club seeks to provide a quality training program for students and to send a competitive team to collegiate nationals every year.

The Collegiate National Skydiving Competition is held December 27-31 every year and offers the club a chance to represent the University.

Last year, Anthony Hanson, instructor and jump master, won the bronze medal for four-way sequential skydiving at the competition.

Four-way requires four skydivers to build formations in the air during freefall.

Points are awarded for the number of formations and accuracy.

Other events include the following: two-way, which is basically four-way with two divers; accuracy, which calls for precision landings; and a style competition which Leech describes as a jumper's ability to demonstrate flying techniques during freefall.

In 1994, the K-State Parachute

Club placed seventh at nationals.

Leech said the club should do better this year because divers will be more experienced, and more divers will be able to make the competition.

Nationals holds competitions for novice, intermediate and master skydivers.

Classifications are based on number of jumps.

Before you make your first jump, instructors will tell you about the inherent risk of jumping from an airplane, which is why they require you to sign a waiver.

Before training begins the instructors will tell you that the only guarantee when jumping from an airplane is that you will hit the ground.

Peuster said he would be lying if he did not admit to losing a friend to the sport, but he said it is far from the norm.

"If you're in the sport long enough, it's just a matter of time," he said.

Still, he said he has never witnessed a fatality.

"I have never been on the drop zone when it's happened," he said.

Hanson said there are more vehicle-related deaths per thousand drivers than skydiving-related deaths per thousand skydivers.

He said he is convinced jumping from an airplane is safer than driving a car.

Chris Furry, instructor and jump master, explained one of the emotions he associates with skydiving after more than 500 jumps.

"You will know the feeling of truly alone," he said.

Wide Web access. It is also asking for $5,000 for public computer work stations and printers. For hardware/software upgrades and maintenance, the library is asking for $3,000 and $2,000 for expanded database licensing for services offered by KSU and Manhattan Public Libraries.

Manhattan Public Library would provide $8,000 in annual operating, maintenance and service costs for an Internet connection.

Brice Hobrock, dean of Farrell Library, said an electronic connection will be made between the two libraries with the funds provided for this year.

"The objective is to make each other's data accessible to the other. It's very important for the community to connect the two libraries," he said.

The fourth project would give $20,000 for a student escort service.

According to the request, about 75 percent of the fund would be used for student salaries with the rest going toward operating expenses.

The escort service would employ six students, three female and three male, at $5 per hour for each employee. The service would operate from 7 p.m. until midnight Monday and Tuesday, and from 7 p.m. until 2 a.m. the rest of the week.

"This will enhance service to people who want an escort off campus," Ronnie Grice, director of the campus police, said.

He said the money allocated this year will be used to purchase uniforms, to hire students and for training. Russell Fortmeyer, engineering senator, told commissioners the service will benefit both the University and community.

"What makes this so crucial is we are building so many public buildings on campus, such as McCain, the library expansion and the art museum.

It is important that we make sure everyone can use the buildings safely," he said.

The fifth priority project the committee identified would give $35,000 for the University Gardens Infrastructure Support.

The project, which is largely privately funded, is expected to cost $15 million including an endowment for maintenance.

This year's funding will be used for the building of a sidewalk and parking lot at the visitor's center, Taussig said.

A sixth project, originally scheduled to be funded for two years, will be completely funded this year.

Traffic lights will be installed at the corner of Kimball and College avenues. Also, College Avenue will be expanded to four lanes south of Kimball.

"We will begin this project sometime between the middle to latter part of May," Jerry Petty, director of community development, said.

you don't want made public," Hébert said.

"In those situations, it doesn't look like a loan or a gift anymore. In those situations, we can tell the difference between a gift or a loan on one hand and robbery or blackmail on the other."

Hébert said it is not surprising that victims are affected by racial harassment or that they are more sensitive to it.

Women who are subject to sexual harassment do not feel complimented, but they suffer from the same problems suffered by victims of racial harassment, she said.

"When sexual activity is brought into the workplace or educational setting, women can tell the difference between being sexually harassed and consensual activity — just like the person who is handing over money can tell the difference between a gift and being robbed," she said.

There are benefits and risks in drawing analogies between sexual and racial harassment, she said. The benefits include the law seeing sexual harassment as wrong no matter how much it occurs or regardless of whether it is unwanted or unwelcome, she said.

The risks involve just the opposite. The courts will begin thinking of racial harassment in terms of being unwanted or unwelcome.

If people who feel they have been harassed have ever told a racial joke, it might come back to haunt them, she said.

who make the decision schedule a second concert in Manhattan are the people in line, the fans.

Hoss Michaels, program director for KXBB-FM 104.7, said Garth Brooks called the station Saturday to thank the fans out at Bramlage.

"He just wanted to call and thank the fans and let them know he would do another show because of all the interest," he said.

Michaels said Garth Brooks was letting people know he would take care of the fans who wanted to see the show.

"To be the hometown station and to be associated with this event is a great honor," he said.

Michaels said it speaks well of Bramlage to make sure people were taken care of properly, Michaels said.

"It is truly a great honor," he said.

The listeners' response on the phone lines after Garth called up to announce he would do another show was incredible, Michaels said.

The call was to say thanks for hanging in there, because Garth knew of the trouble with having to wear the bracelets, Michaels said.

"Also, he had heard there had been some problems with the phonelines at Bramlage. Their system went down for a while," he said.

Comatose mother delivers rapist's child

Associated Press

ROCHESTER, N.Y. — A woman who was raped while in a coma had a premature baby Monday in what doctors believe is the first case of someone getting pregnant and giving birth in a chronic, vegetative state.

The 2-pound, 11-ounce boy and his mother appeared to be doing well, a doctor said.

The 29-year-old woman's family decided to go ahead with the pregnancy rather than seek an abortion and are said to be considering raising the child.

The woman suffered head injuries and lapsed into unconsciousness when her car skidded on ice and crashed into a tree near Ithaca in central New York on Dec. 20, 1985.

She was moved to a nursing home in suburban Rochester in February 1995, and police said several employees, ex-employees and visitors are suspects in the rape.

No arrests have been made.

In late December, the nursing staff noticed that her belly was swelling. They ruled out a digestive blockage and other possible ailments before realizing that she was 4-1/2 months pregnant.

The woman went into labor at about 4 a.m. Monday and gave birth at 5:15 a.m., said Dr. James Woods, a specialist in high-risk obstetrics at the University of Rochester whose medical team performed the natural delivery.

The baby is breathing on his own and needs only supplemental oxygen, he said.

The mother is back in her hospital bed and is doing well, but the pregnancy appears to have had no effect on her comatose state, he said.

Fire destroys local home

■ Mother, child awoken to sound of fire alarm in time to vacate residence

Portia Sisco
staff writer

The charred front of 416 Moro St. marks the remains of a Manhattan resident's home, destroyed Wednesday morning by a fire.

No casualties or injuries were reported, and damages were estimated at $45,000 for the structure and $20,000 for the contents in the house.

Brenda Bly and her 12-year-old son, Jason, woke to the sound of their fire alarm.

"It sounded a lot like my mom's alarm clock, so I just stayed there, but then my mom started yelling, and I looked in the living room, and it was all up in flames," Jason Bly said.

The Riley County Police Department received the call at 5:06 a.m. The fire department responded and arrived within four minutes of the call.

The fire started because of a short in an extension cord, called a zip extension cord, connected to a floor lamp in the living room.

"Zip extension cords are small and thin. They don't stand up to much use and can short out," Chuck Tannehill, fire director, said.

"Cords should be properly sized. Don't use extension cords and put things on top of them."

David Bly was at work at the time of the fire. He works in Osawatomie and only comes home on the weekends.

"My wife called me at 10 till six in the morning," he said.

The Blys were insured. However, it will be four to six months before they can expect to move back in.

"I'm just trying to get settled into an apartment and get a contractor to look at it. What it's looking like now is the entire front half will have to come out," David said. "I'd rather go build a new house if it were up to me, but what I've got insured won't go to a new house."

The family's losses included clothing and personal items.

"The only clothes my wife has is the clothes on her back," David said.

Bly's bank, Capital Federal Savings and Loan, is taking donations for the family.

"Everyone we've talked to, including the bank, have asked if they could do anything to help," David said.

The family lived there for 17 years.

The only clothes my wife has is the clothes on her back.

War games continue on Taiwanese islets

Associated Press

BEIJING — Chinese military drills using live ammunition in the Taiwan Strait ended Wednesday, although other exercises near Taiwanese islets are to continue through Taiwan's presidential election on Saturday.

The live-fire drills diverted ships and airliners for nine days in the waters separating Taiwan from the mainland. The official Xinhua news agency said normal air and sea traffic could resume Wednesday evening.

The drills were the second in a series of escalating maneuvers Beijing made in hopes of scaring voters away from Taiwanese president Lee Teng-hui, who Beijing officials have dropped their shared goal of reunification.

Beijing regards Taiwan as a renegade province and has refused to renounce force to retake it. Since 1949, Taiwan has been ruled by the Nationalist government, which fled the mainland after losing the civil war to the Communists.

The war games have done little to shake President Lee's standing as the front-runner in the campaign.

On Wednesday, Lee said he wants better relations with China and eventual reunification — but not until China becomes democratic.

"We would like in the future to have China unified, in freedom (and) democracy," Lee said at a news conference in Taipei. "We are not threats to anybody. We are friends to all people."

An eight-day exercise in which China launched four surface-to-sur-

Exams make Homecoming bidding tough for greeks

Jessica White
staff reporter

The usual mid-semester stress of tests, papers and projects was added to this week by another big project for many greek members — homecoming bidding.

If you haven't already noticed the chalk on the sidewalks around campus, it has been homecoming bidding week.

The bidding began Monday morning and ended Wednesday. For many sororities, the time in between was filled with skits, dancing, singing and other activities engineered to convince a fraternity who they should choose to celebrate Homecoming with.

This year it was the sororities who extended bids for homecoming partners next fall to the fraternities.

"We voted on one pair to bid, so we've been going back and forth to those houses, trying to be really aggressive and show them that we want them for homecoming," said Becky Hayden, junior in hotel and restaurant management and homecoming co-chair for Kappa Kappa Gamma.

Fitting in all the homecoming excitement around a schedule filled with tests can be difficult.

"It's really hard. Everyone wants to participate in all of the bidding, and they don't have time to do it," Hayden said. "We really stressed that when we picked these houses we were going full-fledged for them. We get really excited for homecoming."

The Kappas were not the only sorority stressed out about homecoming bidding.

"I think it's extremely stressful," said Holly Glover, junior in elementary education and homecoming chairman for Alpha Xi Delta. She said the Alpha Xis started preparing for this week about a month and a half ago. In the last two weeks, she said she spent 20 to 30 hours a week working on homecoming bidding. This week, she said the work was non-stop.

Sorority members were not the only ones taking time out of their schedules for

► DOLE FACES RUNNING MATE CHOICE, THREAT OF PEROT CANDIDACY

WASHINGTON (AP) — Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole says his quick wrap-up of the GOP presidential nomination shows he offers "the right agenda for the next generation."

What looms ahead is the selection of a running mate — a delicate matter in a divided party — and a freshly-renewed threat of a Ross

Perot third-party candidacy.

Solid victories in four Midwestern states, coming exactly a month after a humiliating loss to commentator Pat Buchanan in New Hampshire, nailed down the party's nomination for the 72-year-old Dole.

He had first sought it 16 years ago.

With Buchanan reduced to nuisance status, Dole is planning to make the Senate his bully pulpit — and is also planning to give himself a week off sometime soon in the Florida sunshine.

But for now "I'm going to be a full-time senator," Dole said, in line with his strategy of using his Republican leadership position to carry the fight to President Clinton.

► BUDGET TALKS TO BE REVIVED

WASHINGTON (AP) — While harshly dismissing President Clinton's 1997 budget plan, GOP congressional leaders are responding dutifully to the president's invitation for one last try at reviving balanced-budget talks.

But in advance of today's White House meeting, Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole and House Speaker Newt Gingrich sounded skeptical.

"If the president's serious about a real budget, a real balanced budget, not just adding up arithmetic, not raising taxes, not adding additional spending, then obviously I'm prepared," and I think the speaker's prepared to have meaningful discussions," said Dole, R-Kan., who on Tuesday night clinched the GOP presidential nomination.

For his part, Clinton used the release of his election-year budget earlier Tuesday to tell Republicans once again that they could strike a balanced-budget deal if only they would accept his smaller tax-cut proposal and less-severe savings in Medicare, Medicaid, education, environmental protection and other Democratic priorities.

► JAPAN MOURNS TRAIN TRAGEDY

TOKYO (AP) — White is the color of mourning in Japan, and today the white flowers on a subway platform's makeshift altar told the story of a nation's sorrow.

One year ago, on March 20, 1995, nerve gas spread through five subway cars bound for central Tokyo, killing 12 people and sickening more than 5,500.

Members of a doomsday cult have confessed to carrying out the attack.

Today, transit officials and bereaved families held a memorial ceremony in the central Tokyo station that was the focus of the attack. With trains rumbling by on nearby tracks, mourners prayed for a moment in silence, then unveiled a memorial plaque and made offerings of flowers.

The subway attack, the worst terrorist act of modern times here, shook Japan's long-cherished sense of safety. It also set off soul-searching about whether the very nature of Japanese society — traits like conformity and deference to authority — had helped fuel the rise of Aum Shinri Kyo (Supreme Truth), the cult whose leader goes on trial next month.

Campus buildings lack visual personality

■ Classes are the main reason students frequent campus structures

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

There is approximately 6.5 million square feet of interior space on the K-State campus.

Although space is utilized variedly from offices and classrooms to laboratories and atriums, it is the space members of the K-State community use on a daily basis. It is our home-away-from-home.

Some of us, such as architects or researchers, may spend more time in a K-State building than a residence.

As members of the K-State community, we all utilize different buildings in different areas on campus. An English major might never set foot in Durland Hall, just as an engineering major might never set foot in Denison Hall. One's building experience is relative to one's major, interests or employment.

This narrowed experience heightens the importance of understanding what little building space one does use on campus. Do we get the most out of the buildings we use? Do our buildings give us the most for what we ask?

A conversation concerning these issues was recently facilitated in Robert Condia's fifth-year architecture design class. The following comments came from ideas posed during the discussion:

Although many of the architecture students in the class said they spend most of their time in Seaton Hall — which seems to be conventional wisdom on campus — they did concede that since they are students of architecture they do possess a heightened awareness of buildings and space on campus — as compared to an average student.

However, the students said one shouldn't have to be an architect to tell if a building is successful or not.

The consensus of the class was people on campus are not drawn to any one building, but they go to buildings in which they have class. People are drawn to the K-State Student Union because of its mass function. The more specialized buildings on campus, such as Thompson Hall, do not draw people for any other reason than class.

The class said people are drawn to large, open atriums like Durland and Nichols Hall because they offer exterior-like conditions within a building. Justin Hall was pointed out as having a successful public seating area much like a dormitory, which facilitates socializing.

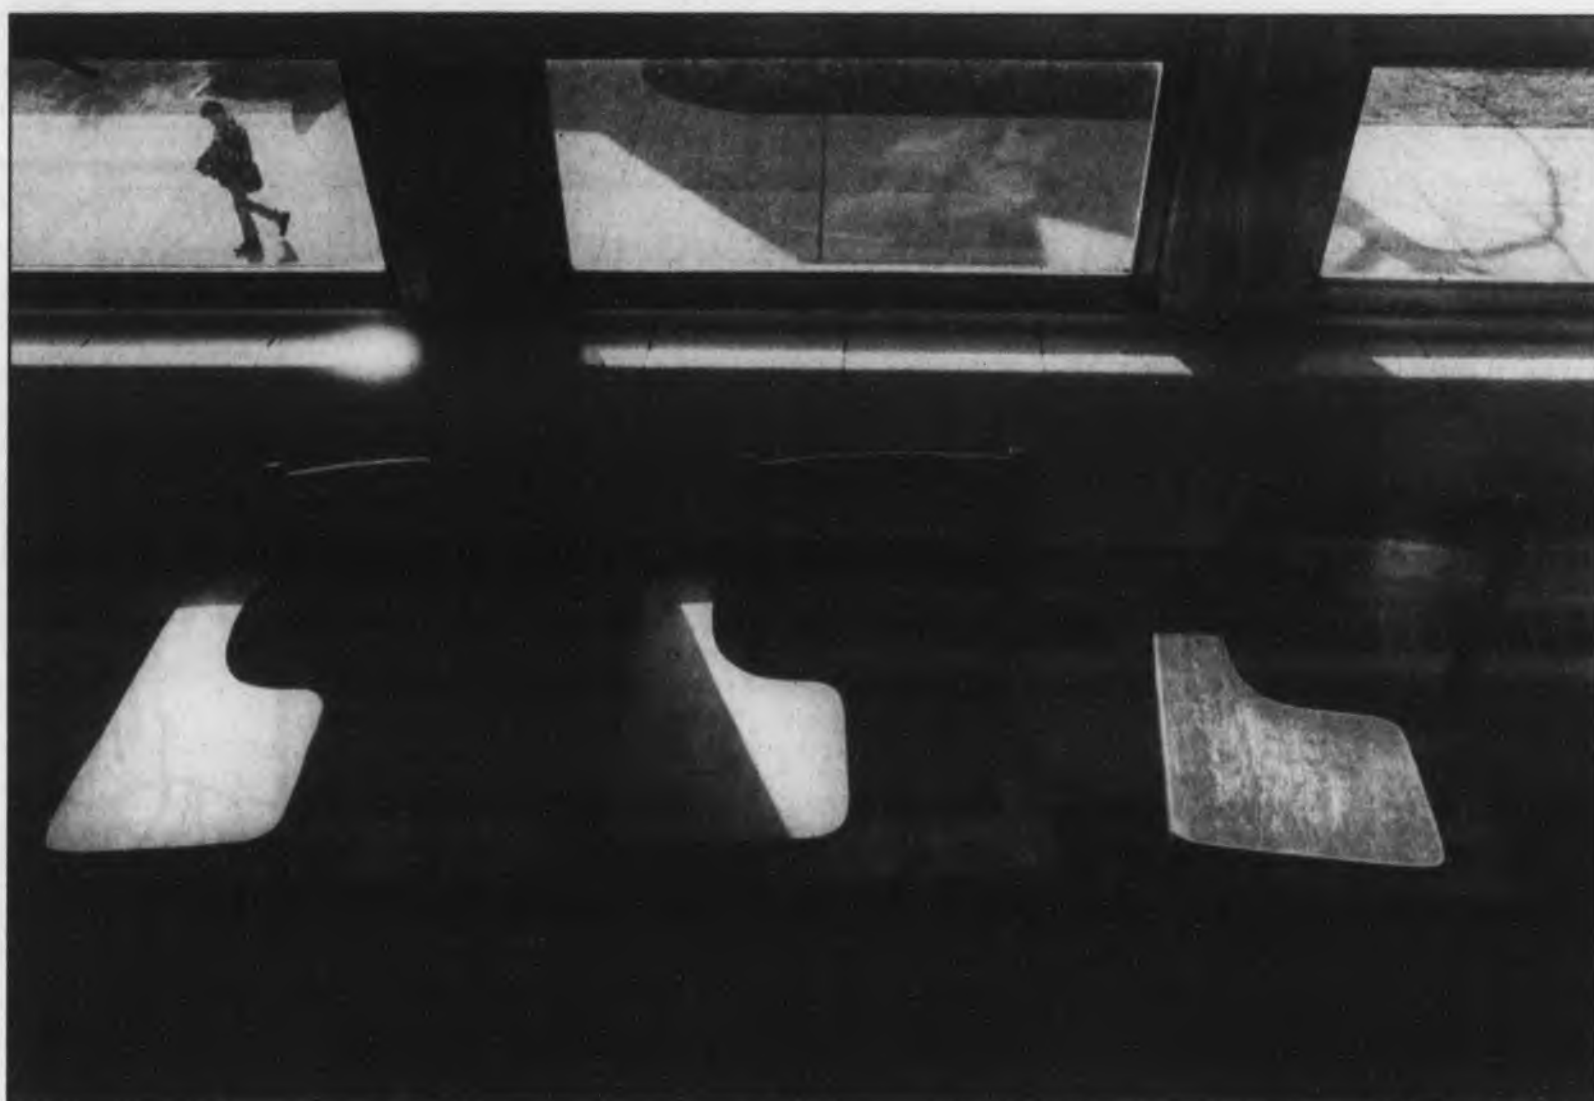

In summation, the class said most of the buildings on campus were not concerned with creating interesting gathering areas or indoor seating alcoves, but with getting the most square feet of classroom space possible. Whether or not one is drawn to a building, a student at K-State spends the bulk of his or her time in a classroom. This is, perhaps, the most important space on campus.

"The design of the classrooms in the older buildings and the design of the classrooms in the newer buildings are not dramatically different," Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning and University architect, said.

"What's changed with the classroom is more with lighting, thermal comfort and the technology of using something other than chalkboards," he said.

Carter said class layouts in Kedzie and Fairchild halls are typical of classroom designs from the 1870s through 1885. "There are some things in there that are typical for that period because they didn't have artificial light, temperature or humidity controls," he said. "They had to have a lot of natural light."

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

One thing every K-State student encounters at some point is a desk. And as is obvious in the 6.5 million square feet of interior space on the K-State campus, desks are quite common.

Carter said in newer buildings, specifically Throckmorton Hall, the architects have tried to include some planned public space near classrooms and laboratories to allow students and professors a place to take a break.

Helen Cooper, assistant director of planning, said older buildings on campus have higher ceilings, which give them a feeling of spaciousness.

A bigger building with lower ceilings, like Bluemont Hall, may be confusing, she said.

"Buildings represent the times," Cooper said. "Bluemont gets a lot of criticism because it's such a dark box, but it was built during a time when energy conservation was very important."

Carter, who studied architecture at K-State as a student, said many of the old, large spaces he knew 25 years ago in Seaton have since been subdivided into different spaces.

The plague of many buildings on campus is the multitude of subsequent additions, not necessarily the original building design. Farrell Library, before the proposed expansion, was a maze of hallways, stairwells and study space. The new expansion is, in part, to correct the newer addition's faults and to add more space.

"As you add on to buildings, you've got a responsibility to make them legible," Carter said. "You can't just stick a box on whatever end of the building you can, and what happens in the old box and the new box won't completely match."

When some buildings on campus were built, an addition was proposed at the same time. Buildings like Durland Hall and Ackert Hall are being built in phases over many years. This building design scheme allows more coherency in layout.

A primary factor in the success of buildings is the siting.

Cooper said the siting of a building must be sensitive to what is around it.

Bluemont, whether or not you agree with its architecture, suffers mainly from its siting. As you approach the building, you are overwhelmed by its height. Once inside, you are underwhelmed by its claustrophobic interior.

Some halls, such as Seaton Hall, have been crudely expanded so much over their histories they are no longer coherent buildings. There are people who work or go to class in Seaton and may or may not know there is a library on the third floor.

As far back as a 1968 campus planning study done as a project by a fifth-year architecture design class, it was concluded that most buildings on campus are unfortunately sited and unneighborly with the buildings adjacent.

Fire safety important this time of year

QUICKread

► Students should check their smoke alarms and fire extinguishers because many fires have broken out in Manhattan in the past month.

A fire devastated the house and possessions of a Manhattan family early Wednesday morning. A short circuit set off the flames.

A zip extension cord, which can be bought relatively cheaply at discount stores, was found at the scene of the fire. The cord was wiring unapproved by the Manhattan Fire Department.

Right now, fires are hitting heavily in the Manhattan area. Unfortunately, carelessness is the cause for most of these fires. Since March 2, the fire department has reported to nine working property fires. In the past 79 days, the department has received 251 fire calls.

The nine fires in March have ranged from chimney fires to inappropriate disposal of ashes.

WeMac & Associates, Fire Safety Consultants, report fire as the third leading cause of accidental deaths in the United States. People should be more safety-conscious.

The Manhattan Fire Department said people should take extra caution when smoking. Don't smoke in bed or in chairs, and be careful when disposing of cigarettes.

Luckily, the Bly family was saved by their home fire alarm. Most families saved by fire alarms are in similar situations as the Blys. They don't smell the smoke because they are sleeping. If the alarm had not woke them up, the poisonous gases present in the smoke would have put them into a deeper sleep. A working alarm cuts the risk of dying in a residential fire in half.

Remember to check all smoke alarms monthly and change the batteries. Have a fire extinguisher in your home at all times.

Please, don't forget to be careful.

ADMISSIONS REQUIREMENTS ARE A GOOD IDEA

Editor,

I am writing in response to Keith Tate's letter in the March 20 Collegian. He makes a valid point that not every student in Kansas receives equal education and parental support. I disagree, however, with his opinion that because of this inequality those students lacking in educational opportunities and parental support are denied equal opportunity to a college education at a state university if the open admissions policy is revoked.

Under the new system of admissions requirements, students will still have equal opportunities. Any student wanting to gain entrance to a state school simply has to put forth the effort to meet requirements. This isn't too far off from the way the system operates now. Students cannot just show up for class. They must put forth an effort to fill out that application and take the ACT. The only addition is that the student must maintain a minimum score or GPA in high school. The minimum requirements are not that difficult to achieve either. Any student with a moderate amount of motivation can achieve them.

In fact, the new admissions requirements stand only to better the University. It keeps those students with substandard scores out, those who are here because of pressure from friends and family, or because they ought to be here. It leaves room for serious students, willing to work for their degree.

If students are not willing to put forth the effort to make the minimum requirements to gain admission, why would they work to succeed in college?

The admissions requirements are a good idea, and K-State only stands to improve because of them.

BOARD SHOULD LET EDITOR DO THE JOB

Editor,

I'm sorry to read the Board of Student Publications' members think they should run the Collegian. This is in contrast to the old days (four years ago), when they were content to let the person they hired do the editor's job.

I always felt that by turning me loose to succeed or fail on my own, the board respected my freedom and that of all the other journalists at the paper. I, along with every other editor in chief I worked for at the Collegian, took seriously the mission of providing student reporters and editors the space to succeed or fail. That made the newspaper one of the best in the United States.

Now, by nitpicking at editorials and loading a very busy editor in chief (believe me, I know) with additional work that may be wholly unnecessary to the operation of a daily newspaper, the board is beginning to encroach on the precious freedom that makes the Collegian the special paper it is.

By trying to run the newspaper, the board may only succeed in running a great newspaper into the ground. The Board is the steward of the Collegian. It should preserve it for the students of today and the future. They should not use it for their own ego gratification.

STOP COMPLAINING ABOUT SENATE AND DO SOMETHING

Editor,

I am writing in response to the editorial in the March 20 edition of the Collegian. Through the use of a clever little story, the editorial board goes on to once again chastise Student Senate for the $83 fee approved for Lafene Health Center. This editorial is one of many in a long line of recent articles, columns, editorials and cartoons that bash student government.

However, I feel it is senseless to continue crying over spilled milk on this issue.

It is obviously very easy to sit back and be critical of the actions Student Senate took regarding the Lafene. It seems to be the trendy thing to do on this campus — to just sit back and complain about every little thing the Student Senate does.

But with all of these complaints, where are the suggestions for improvement? The Student Senate meetings and the Privilege Fee Committee meetings were publicized throughout the semester. In fact one Senate meeting was even moved to a larger room to accommodate more people. A Committee of the Campus meeting was held to deal with the Lafene issue, but where were the concerned people? I don't know.

There were many opportunities to get involved and make your opinion known about the Lafene fee. Yet no one really showed up to voice their opinion. Yet after the fee has passed, everyone has a critical opinion and is ready to broadcast it to everyone.

I would implore that in the future if you don't agree with what is going on in student government, get involved, speak your mind and vote. It is easy to sit back and criticize the decisions Senate makes, but it is a hell of a lot harder to make those decisions.

I would also like to comment about the recent jabs the Collegian has taken at Student Body President Peterson and Vice President Finkeldei. These gentlemen were elected last April on a platform that people must have thought was the greatest thing since sliced bread — no fee increases, keep costs down.

Students thought this was outstanding at the time. But when it was time to make tough decisions and make good on those promises, people said no way.

In light of their recent actions, Peterson and Finkeldei have been repeatedly criticized for "waging personal vendettas" and "sticking to a foolish campaign platform." It is kind of a damned-if-you-do, damned-if-you-don't situation.

They would have been criticized heavily if they had made promises, only to refute those promises after being elected. But they are being criticized now for making good on those promises. Isn't that the American way, to be true to your word?

I think it is highly commendable these two gentlemen open themselves up to such vicious criticism to stand up for something that they believe in.

Even if you don't agree with their stance on certain issues, you can certainly respect them for that. Nice job, guys.

JAKE BREEDING

"It is obviously very easy to sit back and be critical of the actions Student Senate took regarding Lafene. It seems to be a trendy thing to do on this campus — to just sit back and complain about every little thing Student Senate does."

Why would you want to be president?

As of 8:30 p.m. Tuesday, Bob Dole had the Republican nomination in the bag.

No big surprise there. I didn't think too many people would sleep easily with Pat Buchanan in the White House. But hey, Hitler was elected too, so there was always that chance.

We now have seven months of cat-fighting, backstabbing and mud-slinging (also known as the democratic process) to look forward to.

Quite frankly, I'm a little ambivalent about the whole thing. My vote can either go to the lesser of the two evils, or the one I haven't tried yet.

As a Kansan who grew up a mere 30 miles from Bob Dole's hometown of Russell, I feel like I should try to support him. Unfortunately, every time I try to say something nice about the man, I choke on my tongue.

But there's a bigger issue at hand here. After watching the election hoopla, hearing what the pundits have to say and eavesdropping on my classmates, I have one question to ask: Does anyone who should be president want to be president anymore?

Remember being in grade school and thinking being president would be a great job? The mansion, the limo and the sucking up — every third grader's dream.

Somewhere along the line reality set in. We found out how much it costs to run a campaign and that presidents don't really have much clout when the Senate majority leader hates their guts. Disenchantment took its toll.

Now, no one seems to want the job. We've been burned by bad politicians and scared by a press that has an uncanny knack of being everywhere.

I'm actually a little suspicious of someone who would volunteer to run through that gauntlet. I think Bob Dole is running to prove wishes really do come true.

Many perfectly nice, rational men have found themselves doing undignified, silly things due to the election campaign. Michael Dukakis and tanks spring to mind.

The sad fact is the people who really should be in public office have no intention of running — ever. They either don't want their privacy invaded, or they don't want to shell out the money it takes to run. Who can blame them?

These are the people who should be there, though.

They have cool minds and rational heads and know what it is like to be a poor college kid, a union worker or a single mother. They are the ones who could really make a difference in the system because they've actually had to rely on it.

If you think Bob Dole ever had to sell blood while waiting for the financial aid check to come, think again.

The political system has degenerated to the point that we can never have a true Washington outsider in office. You have to be an insider just to raise the funds.

The campaigns are no longer about proving why you are the best person for the job, but rather why the opposition is a horrible person who doesn't deserve to live.

Maybe a return to the old-style campaigns is in order. Men were gentlemen, mean stuff was only said if it was true, and no one wore flannel shirts.

Abraham Lincoln, Franklin Roosevelt and Harry Truman all ran clean campaigns and won, so there is a precedent.

Come on, guys. Prove what great leaders of the people you are. Tell us why you deserve to be president and not why the other guy doesn't.

face ballistic missiles near Taiwan's two main ports ended on Friday. Another round of ground, air and sea drills near outlying Taiwanese islets started on Tuesday and will last until next week.

The exercises 11 miles from the islands involved "only a few ship activities," perhaps because of bad weather on Wednesday, Taiwan's Defense Ministry said.

It said there was no sign of large-scale joint exercises by China's army, navy and air force but predicted full-fledged maneuvers might begin Thursday when the weather is better.

Xinhua said the scale of the live-fire exercises was remarkable in the use of ammunition, the number of troops and different kinds of weaponry.

State-run television, in a lengthy report on its nationwide evening news broadcast, showed fighters strafing the sea and firing missiles. Bombers released their payloads over the water and missiles fired from land and sea, striking target ships.

Fighter groups flew cover for guided-missile destroyers and other surface vessels while diesel- and nuclear-powered submarines patrolled beneath, the news agency said.

"The attack planes were like sudden thunder over the waters; new surface-to-air missiles were like sharp swords piercing the air," Xinhua said.

The United States, Taiwan's Cold War ally, has responded to the military exercises by calling for restraint on both sides. It also has positioned the aircraft carrier USS Independence and its escort ships off Taiwan and sent another carrier, the Nimitz, toward the island.

this matter, here is what I have to say. The excitement here started following the Lunar New Year holidays (about the equivalent of Christmas here).

The one-month period, beginning Feb. 24 until the election date March 23, is the official campaign period for the first general presidential election ever in Taiwan, or for that matter, the whole Chinese history for those who want to equate Taiwan to China.

This is the source of all the tension that is to follow.

The democratic progress in Taiwan is posing a great threat not to the Chinese people, but to the oppressive regime in the People's Republic of China.

While the Taiwanese people are to have the first general election of their president, the Chinese regime is sending its "dissidents" to jail.

There are no longer dissidents in Taiwan; they have only opposition parties.

A Taiwanese leader, like any leader in a democratic society, can no longer just do things at will.

The Chinese government is trying to influence the Taiwanese election. It does not want the Chinese people to hear much about it.

They tried to distort the issue by blaming the United States and the current President Lee Teng-Hui (whose current term is not by general election) for visiting Cornell University where he received a doctorate degree years ago.

They claimed Lee is moving Taiwan toward independence.

The fact is it is inevitable for the Taiwan leaders to seek more political recognition in international affairs. China has been blocking Taiwan for years from playing any role in international organizations. That is no longer acceptable to the Taiwanese people. No other country except the old South Africa has suffered as much non-representation. Regardless of who is the president of Taiwan, there is no choice but to seek more recognition in the international organizations. It is not the president, it is the people's will. You cannot force people to think one way or another in a democratic system.

I believe the conflict will continue unless this Chinese regime changes its outdated way of thinking or unless democracy finally arrives in China. I do not think a full-blown war will start, because the cost on both sides will be enormous. Such a war might also result in the disintegration of China, and the cost to the stability of the whole world would be unthinkable.

I still think the tension will ease after the election, but the conflict will continue. The only solution to the China-Taiwan conflict is not to find a solution. If China continues to force its will on Taiwan, this generation of Taiwanese will not yield.

After all, they have had good experience in toppling the dictatorship of the Chiang Kai-Shek regime.

They have earned themselves a democratic system, and that is not something China can take away.

It is a system that all the Chinese people in the mainland want, and that is what the Chinese regime is afraid of.

► CBS sports tour visits K-State Union front lawn

Escape from classes, play some games and maybe win a new truck.

These are part of the CBS sports tour that moved onto the Union free-speech zone yesterday, bringing two large white tents, games and a chance to win a new Chevrolet truck.

The CBS sports tour will be open today from 11 a.m. to 5 p.m. and Friday from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m.

John Sandlin, program adviser of the Union Programming Council, said although UPC is sponsoring the tour, UPC did not have to pay for the it to come to K-State.

"It didn't cost a dime," Sandlin said.

It's free to students, too. The computerized games, free-throw shots and the drawing are all free.

Sandlin said this is a traveling tour that stops at college campuses throughout the country. The objective for CBS and its sponsors is to target their products at college students.

In addition to CBS, Chevrolet, Goodyear, Mountain Dew, Pizza Hut, Microsoft and Nike are also sponsors. Sandlin said he hopes it will be a lot of fun for students because it's a nice break between classes.

"The only thing it costs is time," Sandlin said.

homecoming bidding. Many fraternities were affected as well.

"I think a better week would have been the week after spring break, because a lot of the professors are getting their tests out of the way this week because they don't want to give them after spring break," said Drew Stewart, junior in milling science and homecoming co-chairman for Tau Kappa Epsilon.

"We tell everybody to be here when the girls come over to show that we're interested, but there's a lot of guys who can't because they're going on campus to study."

But Barb Robel, adviser for Greek Affairs, said scheduling homecoming bidding this week could not be helped.

"At the beginning of the second semester, the interfraternity and panhellenic officers map out the entire calendar for the spring semester," Robel said. "Primarily they wanted to get it done before spring break."

Robel said earlier in the semester the officers of the Panhellenic and Interfraternity councils were busy with conferences and programs, such as the rotating roommate program.

K-State netters start spring break with home duals against Utah, BYU

contributing writer

The K-State women's tennis team will take to the courts again this weekend. It will try to have the same success as the men's football team has had against the WAC conference. The Wildcats will play host to Utah and Brigham Young.

K-State comes into this weekend's play at 3-3 overall. The Cats' last match was against Purdue University. The squad lost the match in one of its closest duals of the season.

Three of the Cats' singles matches went to three sets. Coach Steve Bietau said he hopes the team can take something positive out of that loss.

"The whole team was frustrated over the loss to Purdue," he said. "I hope that the frustration will turn into some kind of action on the court that can make a difference in the matches."

Bietau said problems he saw with the Purdue loss were not physical problems, but mental.

"We just have to learn to be more tough mentally," he said. "We have to do a better job of accepting the difficulties of handling pressure."

For the second straight dual, the team will have the services of Dinah Watson. Watson returned against Purdue after sitting out most of the semester with a shoulder problem.

Bietau said Watson has been able to serve without any pain in her shoulder.

But the Cats will be without the services of freshman Yasmine Osborn. Osborn has been troubled with a stress fracture and did not practice with the team Tuesday or Wednesday.

The first action for the Cats will come on Friday against BYU. The latest ITA rankings have the Cougars listed at No. 10 in the country. Bietau said the Cougars' depth is the key for the team.

"They really have a deep team," he said. "They have a player, Jennifer Saret, who isn't ranked. But she was ranked in the 30s last year and qualified for the NCAA Tournament."

Bietau said a possible match-up between Saret and senior Karina Kuregian would be interesting.

"It's kind of a coincidence that she has never played Karina," he said. "But I always thought that if they played, it would be a great match-up."

Fritz sets new record

Chris May

K-State assistant track coach Steve Fritz took first place in the Elite Division of the College Station Relays decathlon on March 15 in College Station, Texas.

Fritz

The former track and basketball player broke former Olympian Dan O'Brien's record in the 110-meter hurdles.

O'Brien had set the record in 1994 with a time of 13.81. Fritz broke the record with a time of 13.75.

The competition was made up of collegiate and post-collegiate athletes, which combined for 42 athletes who competed in the decathlon.

It was the largest meet held in the U.S. for multiple events, Fritz said.

Fritz said he didn't go out to try to break O'Brien's record.

"I'm always trying to run as fast as I can and score a lot of points," Fritz said.

Fritz said breaking the record wasn't any sweeter because it was O'Brien's.

"Not particularly because I've known him for so long," Fritz said.

"If I would have broken the point record, it would have been different. Other people probably view it differ-

Cowboys' lasso falls short of goal

Shana Newell

sports editor

When the Cowboys rode out of Manhattan Wednesday, they left with only half of what they came for.

The K-State baseball team split its first Big 8 series of the season with Oklahoma State and in the process handed the Cowboys their first Big 8 loss this year in an 8-0 shutout.

Oklahoma State bounced back and snagged a 7-6 victory from the Cats in game two.

"Our team played great. I'm happy," Coach Mike Clark said. "They did a tremendous job, and it wasn't a pleasant day to be playing baseball."

With temperatures hovering in the 40s and a gusty wind blowing infield, K-State had to play against the cold and the wind.

But pitcher Matt Koeman said weather is only part of the game.

"I've been pitching in Kansas for four years now, and I've just learned to play with the weather," he said.

"It's part of the game."

Koeman started the first game for the Cats, pitching eight innings. In those eight innings, he held the Pokes' sluggers to three hits and no runs.

Koeman improved his record to 4-1 on the season with three walks and six strike-outs before he was relieved by Brian Thompson.

"I think it's quite a tribute to Matt and Thompson and to the team for pitching back-to-back shutouts. I don't know when the last time K-State had back-to-back shutouts even was," Clark said.

K-State shut out Regis University Sunday before taking on the Cowboys Wednesday.

"I was hitting the outside corner well today," Koeman said. "They (Oklahoma State hitters) didn't adjust to that well."

Koeman said he had the jitters before heading into Wednesday's contest.

"I was a little nervous heading into the game since I had such a good game the last time," he said. "But I guess my confidence gets a little better as I play more."

Either that or it's playing while sick, he said.

"I've been sick lately with a head cold, so my head was just in the ozone, I guess," he said. "Maybe that helped."

Koeman had support from behind as K-State committed no errors in game one and was paced by right-fielder Chris Hess.

Hess went 2-of-5 at the plate as he knocked in two runs. Only two of K-State's runs were earned.

In game two of the doubleheader, K-State dropped to 14-7 on the season and 1-1 in the league with a close 7-6 loss to the Pokes.

The Cats started out strong, knocking in a run in each of the first third and fourth innings before shelling the Cowboys' pitchers for a three-run fifth inning.

But those six runs would prove not enough as Oklahoma State posted a five-run sixth inning to take the lead.

The game ended with three innings of scoreless baseball from both teams.

"I'm happy with how those guys played," Clark said. "We did not do anything to lose that ball game. Oklahoma State just beat us."

A ninth-inning spark appeared to be flaming into a rally as shortstop Heath Schesser started out with a hit to the Cowboys' shortstop, who threw Schesser out at first.

Hess then reached first on an error by the shortstop before being advanced to second on a Todd Fereday hit to short centerfield.

With runners on first and second, first baseman Dave Hendrix came to the plate.

Hendrix belted a long shot to right field, sending Oklahoma State to the wall. But it was a hair shy of being out of the park, and Hendrix gave the Cats their second out of the inning.

Down to the last out, second baseman Scott Poepard forced the count full.

On the last pitch, Oklahoma State hurled a low inside ball that appeared to Poepard to be a ball.

As Poepard started heading down the basepath, the umpire called a strike and ended the Cats' quest for a sweep.

The flame was quietly extinguished.

K-State continues its nine-game homestand as it prepares to take on the University of Illinois-Chicago in a three-game series starting Saturday with a doubleheader on Sunday.

Kansas City is hoops territory, keep Big 12 Tourney there

With spring break on the horizon, I am presuming most of the students reading this are as disjointed in their thoughts this week as I am. So I will try to write this column in an appropriately disjointed fashion. The following column will contain nonsensical ramblings about various semi-important topics in the world of sports.

■ Keep the Big 12 Tournament in Kansas City. The poor support shown by Dallas last weekend for the NCAA sub-regionals proves once again the Big 12 Tournament should stay in the same place the Big 8 Tournament has become a huge success.

The Big 8 Tournament has risen to its present level in part because of the attention Kansas Citians have paid to it. Unlike other Big 12-area cities such as Dallas, Houston, Denver or St. Louis, college basketball does not have to compete against major winter professional sports in Kansas City.

Because of this, Kansas City is college-hoops territory. The difference between media coverage of the Big 8 in Denver and Kansas City is incredible. While the Colorado Buffaloes are usually buried somewhere behind the ski reports on page 14B in the Denver papers, Big 8 hoops gets front page coverage in Kansas City.

If the tournament were to move to any of the other major Big 12 cities, one could expect the same coverage as the Big 8 gets in Denver, which is less than professional teams such as the Colorado Avalanche and Denver Nuggets, both of which compete in winter.

The Big 12 has a good thing going in Kansas City. Let's hope they do not do anything to change that.

■ On a related topic, I am starting to get tired of the arena-bashing taking place regarding the Big 8/Big 12 Tournament's home — Kemper Arena. For the past few seasons, I have watched the Nuggets, and now the Avalanche, play in Denver's McNichols Sports Arena.

Big Mac, as it is known, makes one appreciate the positive aspects of Kemper. The concourses at Big Mac are narrower than Kemper's (although both have room to improve) while Kemper has superior concession and restroom facilities because of the second concourse level, accessible from the second seating level.

There is also more leg room in the seats at Kemper, while access to major freeways make for an easy trip in and out of the arena.

To be sure, Kemper is not perfect, and pales in comparison to Phoenix's America West Arena or Salt Lake City's Delta Center. And Denver plans to replace Big Mac with the Pepsi Center, a downtown arena that will be part of an amusement complex.

But while Kansas City debates the concept of a $150 million downtown arena in hopes of drawing a major professional franchise, or at least keeping the Big 12 Tournament, Kansas Citians should know there are cities that are surviving with worse than what they have. And to an unnamed Kansas City Star columnist whose initials are Jason Whitlock — Kemper is not a dump.

■ The issue of Mahmoud Abdul-Rauf standing, or refusing to stand, for the national anthem might be the most-blown-out-of-proportion story since the O.J. Simpson trial. Regardless of what position you take on the issue, odds are you heard more about it than you ever wanted to know.

I have to admit I was surprised to even see it hit the media outside Colorado. But when I started hearing about the issue on national newscasts and television tabloid shows, I realized how slow a news week it really was.

Eventually, the attention turned to the suspension of Abdul-Rauf without pay, which meant he was losing more each game than most of us will make after graduating from college.

In the end, Abdul-Rauf agreed to stand and say a Changing user ID is lengthy, costly process for students

Internet-related stories appear in each Wednesday issue of the Collegian.

Changing your e-mail user ID will cost you a little more than just a trip to Computing and Network Services.

For the past three years, CNS has attached a $20 fee to changing e-mail addresses.

Changing a user ID consists of transferring all the information incorporated with a student's address to another account.

"We're changing more than just an e-mail address. We're changing user IDs," John Bucher, director of CNS, said. "It's a lengthy process."

Angie Lemon, senior in computer engineering and CNS consultant, said 30 to 40 students inquire about changing their address each semester, while 20 actually go ahead with the change process.

"A lot of students decide to stick with their current address when they find out about the fee," Lemon said. "The fee is used to deter students from randomly changing their addresses."

Cori Herbers, senior in agriculture, wanted to change her user ID until she found out there was a fee involved.

"My ID is kind of hard for people to remember," Herbers said. "When I found out there was a fee tacked on, I couldn't believe it. Haven't they charged us for enough already?"

Confidentiality is another concern of students.

"We keep all student information confidential," Bucher said. "The only way anyone can access someone else's account is to know their password."

CNS doesn't require students to give reasons with their address change requests.

"It's usually just a personal preference," Lemon said.

"Harassing e-mail is one of the reasons for a desired change," Lemon said.

"But most students get their addresses when they first come to K-State and decide they want something different later."

Bucher said there is no need for the fee to increase any time soon.

"We are pretty comfortable with the fee at this time," he said.

Speed limits to increase Friday

Associated Press

TOPEKA — Drivers legally can boost their top speed to 70 mph on interstate highways in Kansas on Friday, the day higher speed limits enacted by the Kansas Legislature take effect.

They also can go 65 mph on the state's 9,000 miles of two-lane highways, as far as the Kansas Highway Patrol is concerned, until the Department of Transportation officially reduces the speeds on some unsafe stretches and posts new signs.

However, if motorists are going to take the higher speed on the two-lanes starting on Friday, they might want to watch out for the local sheriff or police.

KDOT's advice, spokesman Ken Miller said, is for motorists to "drive at what is posted."

For the time being, all two-lane highways will remain posted at 55, even though the law that takes effect at 12:01 a.m. Friday allows 65.

That is because KDOT won't be posting new limits on the two-lanes until it completes its speed studies.

Lt. Sam Grant, director of research and planning for the Patrol, said the law says the speed limit is 65 mph on two-lane highways unless posted otherwise, and the Patrol is taking that literally.

"We're going to enforce the law as written," he said. "In other words, we're going to assume that it is a 65-mph road until it's posted otherwise by the Kansas Department of Transportation.

"As far as those roads where 65 is too fast, people are going to have to use their own judgment."

Grant was noncommittal on what drivers should do where presently posted signs show 55 mph and drivers won't know when KDOT has posted new signs, or whether the speed has been kept at 55 because of unsafe conditions.

Some sheriffs have declared they will make arrests until the higher speed limits are posted, including Shawnee County Sheriff Dave Meneley.

The posted speed limits on two-lane highways will not be changed from 55 — the national speed limit for two decades until Congress repealed it late last year — until KDOT completes its studies and begins changing signs, a process likely to take up to three months.

The Kansas Turnpike Authority began this week erecting new signs increasing the limit from 65 to 70 mph on the 236-mile toll road from Kansas City to the Oklahoma border south of Wichita.

Those signs will be uncovered at dawn on Friday, and the remainder of the 78 new turnpike signs will be erected during the day.

story by Jill Story

■ Calving season means change of lifestyle for some students

Heifers lift their heads and bellow outside K-State's Purebred Beef Barn. Inside, a mouse scuttles across the spit-stained floor as strains of country music fill the air. As always, there is work to be done.

There are 2,500 acres and 350 head of cattle including Hereford, Simmental and Angus that need taking care of.

Spencer Schrader, junior in animal science; Chad Ward, senior in animal science; Jeff Brandenberger, senior in animal science; Jeff George, junior in animal science; and Warren Forbes, senior in animal science, along with head herdsman Troy Marple, do the job.

"Everything changes. We don't really have a certain schedule that we go by every day. There are always new things to face," Brandenberger said.

A typical day starts out at 7 a.m. with the morning feeding and chores. Bulls at the barn eat twice a day. Everything else is fed once. Then there are fences to mend, water to haul and new babies to tag and weigh.

Right now it is the middle of calving season, so the babies take up a lot of time.

"We'll have about 250 calves when it is over," Brandenberger said.

During this season, Brandenberger and his fellow employees take turns with night duty during calving season.

"We check the heifers three times a night. We try to get up about every two hours or so," George said.

Kansas weather's habit of going from beautiful to freezing isn't good for the calves.

"When it keeps changing from cold to warm, we get a lot of sick calves. They can't handle the cold very well," George said.

George and Ward said they sometimes bring newborn calves up to the barn and put them in the office for a while to warm them up.

When it's not calving season, there are other projects that take up time.

"Spring is the busiest time here," said Ward.

Besides calving season, spring also brings the bull sale, breeding time, when they artificially inseminate cattle, and the Little American Royal.

The Royal is next month. Students who are breaking cattle and showing them at the Royal are busy preparing, and they do this at the barn, Marple said.

Chores, feeding and other miscellaneous duties take up 35-40 hours a week for the employees. They also have to go to school.

"We try to schedule our classes so that we can go to them during a block of time and work after that," Brandenberger said.

It is a busy life, but the employees say that they would not want it any other way. They said they like the wide-open spaces, the people they work with and being around the animals.

"It's more of a way of life than a job," Brandenberger said.

Out of the darkness of the hallway, Spencer Schrader cleans up in a restroom after helping a heifer deliver a calf.

Schrader, junior in animal science and industry, helps a first-calf heifer deliver about 5 in the morning. Calving at the Purebred Beef Teaching Research Center occurs from January to March. At the end of the season there will be about 250 new calves to take care of.

Chad Ward, senior in animal science and industry, spreads grain in a feeder at the beef barn. The six employees of the beef barn feed and care for more than 300 head of K-State's cattle daily.

Schrader yawns during an early morning study break in his living quarters at the beef barn. He was trying to pass time before helping a heifer deliver her calf. The barn's six employees rotate spending nights at work so there will always be someone to keep an eye on the cattle.

Jeff Brandenberger tosses a ball of hay out of the loft of the beef barn.

Troy Marple (left), Jeff George, junior in animal science and industry, Ward and Brandenberger clean hay out of a stall at the beef barn. All agreed that it wasn't their favorite job, but it was something that had to be done.

Sufferbus soars with integrity, animated style

staff writer

The harmonic genesis of Sufferbus evolved from the skeletal remains of the Moving Van Goghs, and in less than three years, the band has developed an identity and sound independent of its lineage.

Guitarist/vocalist Mitchell Leggs and bass guitarist/vocalist Brian Harris began playing together in Moving Van Goghs, and when the band split, they joined with Ken Pingleton, drummer for Circus Maximus, and became Sufferbus.

The fruits of the band's labor have begun to pan out recently with recognition outside Manhattan and interest from various labels.

"We got a lot of really positive feedback, and what we're doing now involves a lot of follow-up of that."

The band is optimistic about opportunities in both its ultimate and immediate future.

"The result of this for now is that we'll get connections for other gigs at better clubs where we'll actually get paid a minimum that's worth driving up for," Pingleton said.

The band's animated style seems to balance out some of the darker themes in the lyrics, and other songs disperse hints of idealism and social consciousness. The band's approach to writing music is simple.

"We've always used the same approach," Harris said. "We play what we like to hear."

Although the band maintains its musical integrity, Leggs said it is important that people can identify with where they're coming from.

"Some bands lose sight of that, and they get so the music is so opaque that no one understands what they're trying to say," Leggs said. "Most of the lyrics are sarcastic, but it's honest."

"I write a lot about people, but the point isn't that it's about specific people," Leggs said. "It's just about things you come in contact with, or people you come in contact with, because people happen to people."

"What we try to achieve is substance over form. A lot of bands are more into form over substance, what they're wearing and 'who they are,' he said.

This basic philosophy is a common thread among the members and has been a big part of how they've come this far, Pingleton said.

"We're more of a unit, as opposed to four guys in a band," he said. "We've been able to bond pretty solid."

The band has participated in a series of festivals, including the Mississippi River Music Festival in St. Louis and the Grain Reaper Harvest Ball in Nebraska. For now the potential of festivals isn't worth the sacrifice, Pingleton said.

The band has several compilation disks, including "Feast of the Sybarites" and "The Mortal Micronotz Tribute," which also features Truck Stop Love.

Both compact discs, as well as the latest seven-inch release "Metamorphine," are available in Manhattan.

"Manhattan is good in the sense that it's centrally located, but as far as live music in this town, there's not so much support," Harris said.

"It seems to go in cycles, but there's always a core group of people that come out. Regardless of how well it's going we can generally count on that core group."

With the direction the band seems to be going, plans that once seemed unrealistic for a Manhattan-based band no longer seem so out of reach, Harris said.

"Recently it seems like an actual attainable goal, and we've been really getting momentum," Harris said. "We might actually be able to pay our rent with this."

Royals' agenda to focus on team's youth

Associated Press

LAKELAND, Fla. — The Kansas City Royals are unlikely to make a trade before their April 1 opener in Baltimore, even though they still need left-handed pitching help, general manager Herk Robinson said.

"We're not actively talking to anybody," Robinson said Tuesday. "There just isn't that much available."

When spring training opened, the Royals' biggest needs were a right-handed, power-hitting outfielder and a lefty reliever to bolster the bullpen.

Patrick Lennon, hitting .367 this spring with two homers, and Les Norman, .323 with two homers, are expected to fill the first need. But no left-handed relievers have emerged.

The only left-handers still in camp who might make the bullpen are Jason Jacome and Dave Fleming. Jacome has had the better spring, with a 3.09 ERA in 11 2-3 innings.

Mike Magnante, with a 1.00 ERA in nine spring innings, has nailed down one of the lefty relief spots. Most teams like to have two left-handers in the bullpen.

"If you bring in another left-hander, you'd force a right-hander off the club, and (Jim) Converse, (Rusty) Meacham and (Terry) Clark have been doing well," Robinson said.

The Royals passed up several trade offers because they didn't mesh with the team's emphasis on youth.

"It's what's best for us long-term to be better than the Cleveland Indians," manager Bob Boone said. "You could make some deals, but those deals inhibit your growth, of finding out what Hammer (Bob Hamelin) is going to be or what (Joe) Vitiello is going to be or what (Joe) Randa is going to be or maybe one of the outfielders. We've constantly said we're not going to do that."

BYU also has a player that is in the most recent ITA rankings. Freshman Eline Chiew is currently ranked 28th in the country.

On Saturday, the Cats will take to the courts against Utah. The Utes are the No. 46 team in the country. Their top player is junior Mirja Wallmark, who is ranked 31st in the country.

BYU and Utah are not the only teams who will enter this weekend's contest with ranked players. The latest ITA rankings showed four players from the K-State squad.

Sophomore Yana Dorodnova entered the singles rankings at No. 69. So far this season, Dorodnova has yet to lose a match. Already, she has had two big wins against opponents who are ranked higher than she is. Earlier, Dorodnova defeated Lisa Field of Wichita State, who is ranked No. 35 in the country.

And just a couple weeks ago, Dorodnova posted her biggest win of her collegiate career with a straight set victory over Jennifer Hall of Notre Dame. Hall is currently ranked No. 21 in the country.

Senior Karina Kuregian will enter this weekend's matches sitting at No. 73 in the country. Since returning to the singles lineup, Kuregian has recorded a perfect record.

"If Karina is healthy, she is better than a ranking in the 70s," Bietau said.

Also serving their way up the rankings is the doubles team of Karina Kuregian and Lena Piliptchak. The duo's success this semester has earned them a spot at No. 54 in the country.

Bietau said this weekend's action will show what improvements the squad has made.

"I'm pleased with how well practice has been going this week," he said. "But ultimately you can't see improvement until the players take to the courts."

Both matches will start at 1 p.m. at L.P. Washburn tennis courts east of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. In case of inclement weather, matches will be held at the Cottonwood Racquet Club.

silent prayer after he realized how much money he would lose while under suspension. Meanwhile, the NBA has dug up another rule nobody knows or cares exists, similar to an isolation violation (the offensive violation you see at least once a season in an NBA game).

■ Congratulations to the K-State basketball team. Regardless of what Saturday's Kansas City Star might have said, the Wildcats' season should not be considered a disappointment in any way. For a team that was picked to finish seventh in the Big 8, a first round loss in the NCAA Tournament looks pretty good.

The Cats shot worse than Elmer Fudd against New Mexico, but they have nothing to hang their heads about. Look for K-State to continue its climb next season, creating a three-way race between Kansas, Iowa State and K-State at the top of the Big 12 North Division standings.

■ And yes, I did pick Arkansas to return to the Sweet 16.

ently than me."

Fritz's first-place finish in the decathlon with 8,484 points also set a new meet record, was his second highest score and was an automatic qualifier for the U. S. Olympic Trials. This will be nothing new for Fritz, who was at the U.S. Olympic Trials in 1992.

"I placed fifth last time," Fritz said. "It was not a very good competition."

Working out, staying healthy and getting stronger are the goals of Fritz's workout and for the trials, which are in June in Atlanta.

"I need to try and get into a little better shape and keep making progress," Fritz said.

"I'm not satisfied."

The Olympics take the top three in the decathlon, and Fritz said he needs to stay healthy to have a shot.

"As long as I'm healthy, I should be OK," Fritz said. "You only have one chance."

Fritz is in his fourth year as assistant track coach.

He said he's glad to be at K-State, although he feels he never left.

"I never really left. After graduation I stayed here to train," Fritz said.

"It's a good place for me. I feel real comfortable here."

Fritz grew up only an hour and half away from Manhattan, and his mother went to K-State.

Balancing coaching the team and training for himself isn't easy for Fritz. "It's kind of hard at times," Fritz said.

"I lift in the morning, and I work out from 2 to 4 (p.m.), and then the team practices from 4 (p.m.) to whenever."

With all this hard work and a first-place finish in the decathlon, Fritz isn't taking anything for granted.

"It's early in the year," Fritz said.

KANSAS SPEED LIMITS INCREASE TODAY

Drivers can legally boost their top speed to 70 mph on interstate highways in Kansas today. Higher speed limits enacted by the Kansas Legislature took effect at 12:01 this morning.

They also can technically go 65 mph on two-lane highways, but some local sheriff and police have said they will enforce the 55 mph limit until new signs are up.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN

LETTER

Taiwan has 1st election; citizens rally

Chii-Dong Lin is a K-State distinguished professor in physics on sabbatical in Taiwan. He wrote this personal account about the upcoming presidential elections in Taiwan.

It is supposed to be just a normal working day; it is not. You can hear the loudspeakers in full blast, the firecrackers popping continuously as thousands of supporters cruise by in automobiles, on motorcycles and on bicycles. The campaign banners are in every corner of the streets.

On televisions, you see candidates appear at three or four rallies a day where tens of thousands of supporters gather to hear speeches. Yes, Taiwan is to hold its first direct presidential election ever in just 48 hours. It is a fierce war among the four presidential candidates and their supporters. The military exercise that is still going on off the Taiwan Strait by the People's Republic of China appears to have faded to just noise.

As a Taiwanese American who has witnessed six presidential elections in the United States, it is an enlightening experience to see how this island has progressed the two decades since I left.

The transformation has not been easy, but there was no bloodshed in this period.

The past political prisoners are now leaders in the opposition party. In fact, Dr. Peng Meng-Ming, a political refugee who resided in the United States for 30 years, is the candidate from the Democratic Progress Party (DPP).

He is the top opponent against the incumbent Lee Teng-Hui from the ruling Kuomintang (KMT) party. Lee has been an international celebrity since his visit to Cornell University last June, where he received his doctorate in the '60s. Lee, and to some extent, all of Taiwan, owe much of the publicity which makes this election an international event to the missiles and three rounds of military exercises from China.

The Chinese created unprecedented tension in the Pacific Rim about two weeks ago by launching four missiles only about 30 miles off the two major port cities in Taiwan: Keelung in the north and Kaoshiung in the south. They openly stated the purpose is to intimidate the Taiwanese voters into selecting a new leader acceptable to China.

The popular election of a Taiwanese president also poses a great threat to the Beijing regime, which slaughtered thousands of its workers and students in 1989 when these people asked for democracy. Despite the general belief that a direct attack on Taiwan is very unlikely, the war games played by China could easily escalate to a full-blown war, which would send the whole world into turmoil.

Only the quick response from the Clinton administration in sending two carriers to the region and the strong condemnation by the Congress can stop the Chinese regime from going further. It is a role the United States cannot shy away from because all other countries in the region are intimidated by the sheer size of China.

Because the U.S. trade in this region amounts to about 80 percent of our trade with Europe, it is in the interest of the United States to maintain stability in this region. For Kansans, any conflict would cost the state hundreds of millions of dollars from the loss of wheat sale to the two countries.

It is to the benefit of all of people, including the Americans, the Taiwanese and the Chinese, to see the Chinese threat contained. Only after the Chinese have their own democratic government will stability in the region be assured. It is ironic that it takes the first presidential election in 400 years of Taiwanese history to bring out the real faces of the dictators in China whom the whole world has to deal with in the years to come.

But this is just the typical history of Taiwan; the Taiwanese have never been left alone to mind their own business. Still the people are very calm, even when the missiles are flying all over the Taiwan Strait.

Many of my Taiwanese friends have told me there is nothing to worry about because there is nowhere else for them to go. They would deal with any hardship as it comes along. And the only thing that is important to them now is they want to proudly cast their votes in the first presidential election of their lives. They will not let the Chinese threat disrupt this historical event.

STUDENT SENATE

Lafene referendum fails in Senate

Students will not vote on the health fee during elections

Courtney Marshall
staff reporter

Students will not have the opportunity to express their opinions about the student health fee during the Student Government Association elections April 9-10.

The bill that would have authorized a plebiscite for the student health fee was lost by one vote. A plebiscite is not binding, and the results would not necessarily be used to change the current system, Trent LeDoux, agriculture senator, said.

"Our goal is to use it for student opinion," LeDoux said.

Jeff Sweat, arts and sciences senator, spoke in opposition of the plebiscite and said the results of the vote could be misleading.

"What's going to happen is the people who feel passionately about Lafene will show up to vote. The results will be misleading unless everyone is forced to vote, and we can't do that. I just think the results of this little vote could be very misleading," Sweat said.

Tim Riemann, agriculture senator, submitted an amendment that suggested Lafene services could be cut in the future if the appropriate level of funding were not reached.

He submitted an amendment to reword the survey to eliminate language that he believed biased the survey. He wanted the survey to explain that some services could be cut or lowered.

"It's important to see the students' voice on this. If I was to vote, I'm inclined to believe the survey is weighted. It's common sense that this (services being cut) could happen," Riemann said.

Some other senators also said the amendment was leading, and it failed to pass with a majority vote.

An amendment to the SGA Constitution concerning proxy voting also failed.

Currently, senators can obtain a proxy vote if they are excused by the Senate Chair. The chair excuses senators if they have exams scheduled the same time as a Senate meeting.

Many senators were opposed to banishing proxy voting and said their constituents would not be served at all if they did not get to let someone else carry their vote.

"I don't think the 300 people I represent shouldn't have a vote. If you talk to your proxy beforehand, you can let them know how you want to vote," Wendy Strevey, intern coordinator, said.

Some senators said the proxy vote was used to sway the outcome of voting and was being misused.

"If you're not going to use the proxy right, then don't use the damn thing at all," Jake Breeding, arts and sciences senator, said.

Chris Avila, graduate senator, said proxy voting was against the idea of representative voting as expressed in Robert's Rules of Order.

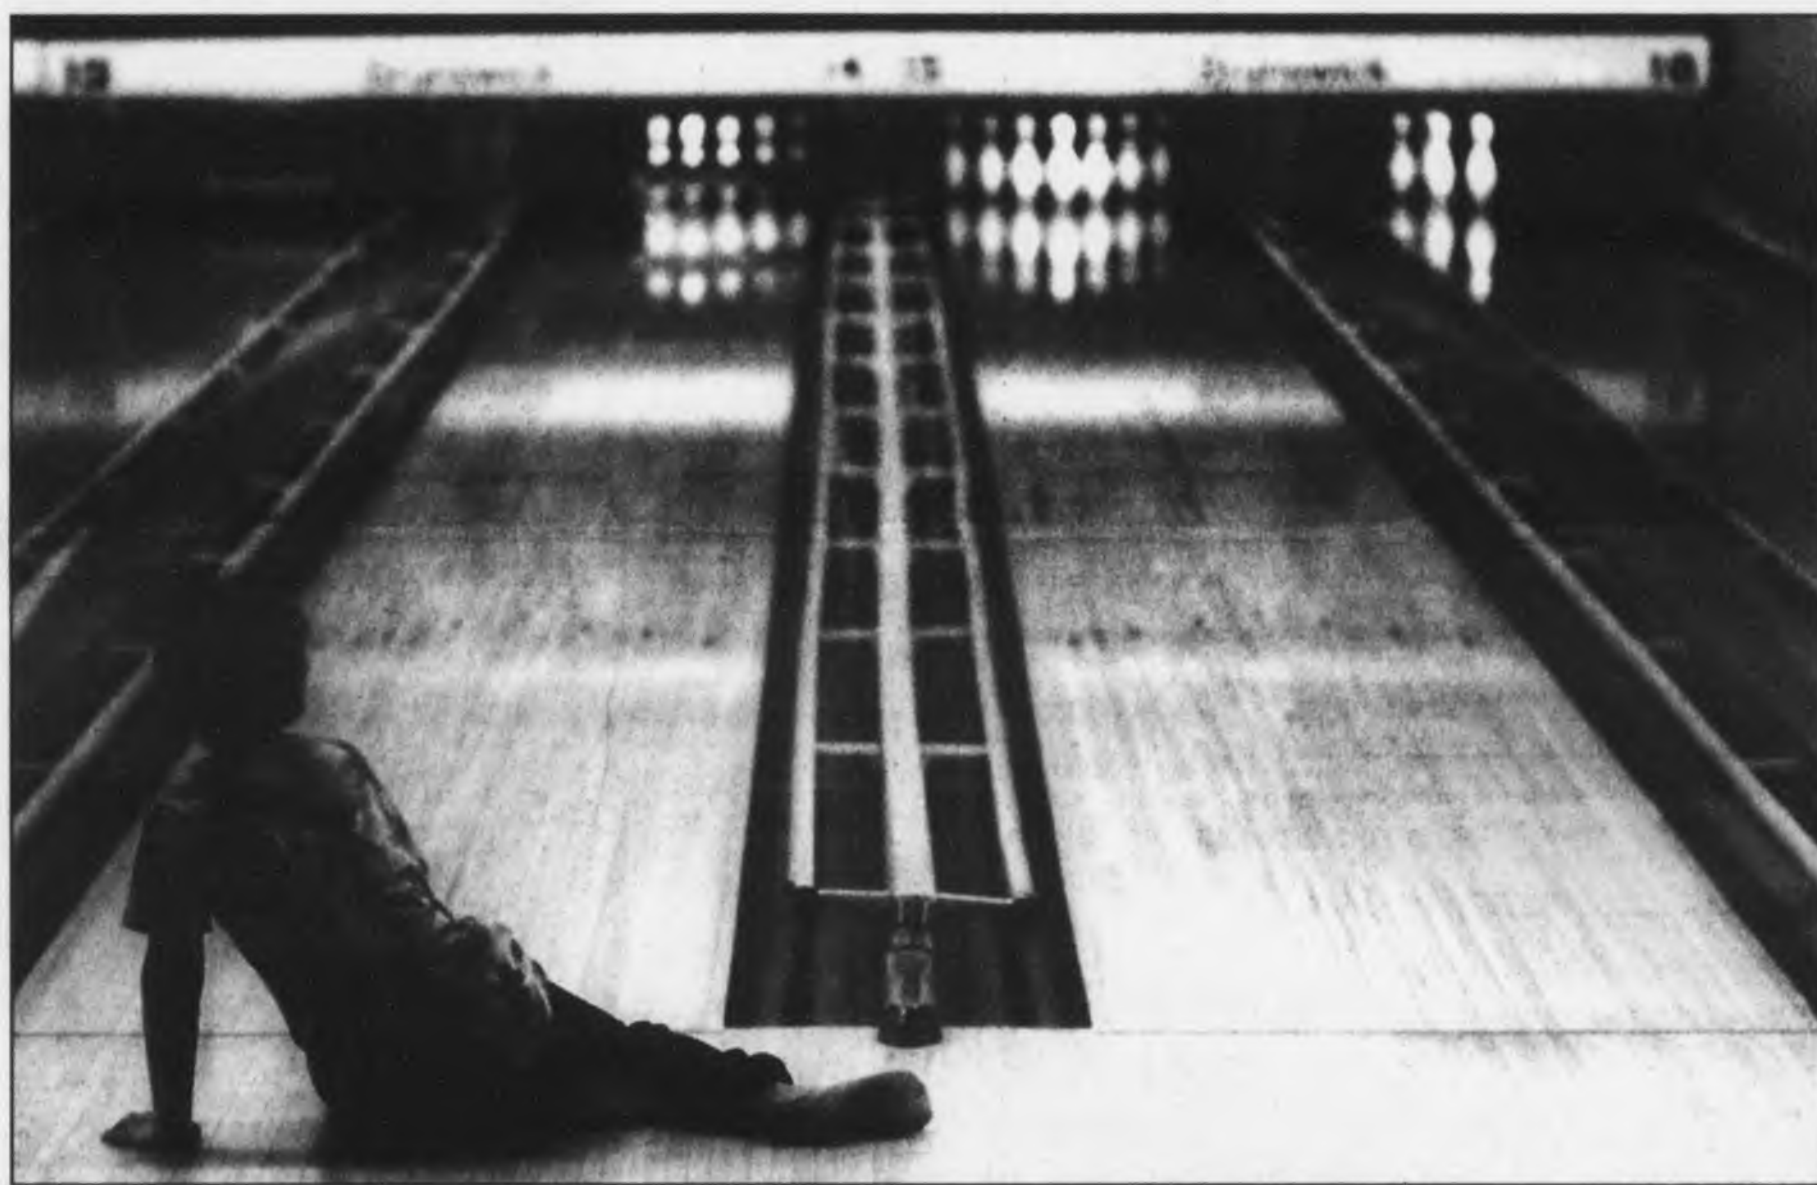

A clarification, which passed, was made to a provision in the Athletic Fee continuance that was passed Feb. 8.

The clarification removed the cap on nontraditional student ticket prices and allowed tickets to be purchased for basketball and football at the student season ticket rate. According to the clarification, nontraditional students are defined as students who are more than 25 years old, have children or are married.

As a Taiwanese American who has witnessed six presidential elections in the United States, it is an enlightening experience to see how this island has progressed the two decades since I left.

Dean announces retirement plan

Rathbone steps down after 22 years of involvement

Abbi Hake
staff writer

Donald Rathbone, dean of the College of Engineering, has announced his plans to retire within the next year.

"During Don Rathbone's tenure as dean of the College of Engineering, the college has moved into the forefront of being one of the best colleges of engineering," President Jon Wefald said.

Rathbone, who has spent the last 22 years at K-State, has worked to increase enrollment and funds for the college.

Rathbone said he'll miss K-State but will remain in Manhattan because he loves it here.

"This is our home," Rathbone said.

Wefald said that a specific retirement date will follow the appointment of a new dean.

"Don Rathbone has been one of the superb fundraisers of all time," Wefald said.

During a recent five-year fund-raising campaign called the Essential Edge, the college raised more than $33 million.

It was also under Rathbone's leadership that the undergraduate enrollment increased from 949 to 2,600 and the graduate enrollment from 150 to 500. Wefald said Rathbone should also be credited for his help in the construction of Durland Hall as well.

Rathbone said his decision to retire stems from the fact that he has reached the retirement age and the time is right for the college.

"It's probably the best time to step down. We're well-positioned for the future," Rathbone said

COLLEGE OF BUSINESS ADMINISTRATION

New dean interacts with students

Bill Bontempo
staff writer

After a nation-wide search for a new dean of the College of Business Administration, K-State selected from among its own educators to fill the position.

The position was filled by Yar Ebadi, who had served as associate dean of the college since 1992 and was serving as interim dean since former dean Dan Short left last spring.

Ebadi's philosophy is to serve the students.

"The reason we are here is because the students are here," he said.

"They are our customers. They are our stakeholders," he said.

As dean, Ebadi said he plans to continue making special attempts to spend time with students.

He has talked to them in the hall, in classrooms and during club meetings.

During the 13 years he has worked at K-State, Ebadi has interacted with students at the college telefunds, open houses and career days.

President Jon Wefald said a half-dozen candidates were interviewed for the position, and the selection of Ebadi speaks well of the new dean and the College of Business Administration at K-State.

N. STEWART ANDERSON/Collegian

Ebadi came to K-State in 1983 as an associate professor of management in the College of Business Administration and was promoted to full professor in 1988.

He has earned many honors at K-State, including being named the college's Outstanding Teacher of the Year in 1987.

Ebadi has authored many business publications, conducted research in several business-related areas and presented papers at a number of professional conferences.

Ebadi's goals as dean are to gain reaccreditation of the college and to make the business college the school of choice among Kansas high school graduates.

"His vision of setting priorities in a college of business like ours is right on target, and his strategy for achieving those goals is doable," James Coffman, K-State provost said.

The movie will be filming on location in Burns and a few other south-central Kansas towns for two weeks in April. The movie stars Jack Nicholson as president of the United States during an invasion of Martians. Nicholson will not be filming in Kansas.

Burton has directed "Beetlejuice," "Edward Scissorhands," "Batman" and recently, "Ed Wood."

The casting directors are specifically looking for senior citizens or Asian youths but will consider anyone who wishes to audition.

Auditions will be from 9 a.m. to 3 p.m. Saturday in the El Dorado High School community gymnasium.

El Dorado is located 30 miles northeast of Wichita, just off the Kansas Turnpike.

No costumes or prepared material are required.

COWBOY JOKER TO PERFORM

Put on your cowboy boots and hat, because western cowboy humorist Baxter Frazier will perform at 7:30 p.m. tonight in McCain Auditorium.

The veterinarian turned poet and humorist has performed all over the United States and Canada, including an appearance on "The Tonight Show," said Steve Frazier, the K-State rodeo coach and a friend of Black.

A native of Las Cruces, N.M., Black will be making his second appearance at K-State. He performed for a sellout crowd two years ago and the crowd went away happy, Frazier said.

This performance is one of nearly 115 engagements he does a year, traveling to colleges and auditoriums and spreading his unique western story-telling brand of humor, Frazier said.

Tickets are still available for the performance through the McCain Box Office and range from $10 for balcony seats to $12 for orchestra seating.

U.S. IMMIGRATION TOUGHENS

WASHINGTON (AP) — The House rejected new limits on legal immigration Thursday, narrowing the most significant immigrant bill in a decade to a get-tough-on-illegals measure.

Supported by the Clinton administration, the move to delete most of the bill's restrictions on legal immigration was approved by a 238-183 vote.

The portions of the bill left intact would add 5,000 Border Patrol agents over five years, crack down on smugglers of aliens, document forgers and illegal aliens who overstay temporary visas, bar members of foreign terrorist organizations and set up an 800-number in five states that employers could call to check whether job hunters were eligible to work in the United States.

Rep. Lamar Smith, R-Texas, the bill's chief author, said the amendment hurts American families and workers.

GM, WORKERS TO END STRIKE

DAYTON, Ohio (AP) — General Motors Corp. and the United Auto Workers reached a settlement Thursday in a 17-day brake-factory strike that idled more than 177,000 employees and brought the world's No. 1 automaker to a near standstill.

The strike by a single union local at two Dayton factories had forced GM to shut down 26 of its 29 North American assembly plants and 18 parts plants in the United States, Canada and Mexico. It also halted work at countless independent suppliers and hurt companies such as restaurants that depend on the autoworkers.

The walkout is the longest strike against GM in 26 years.

Details of the agreement were not released. A ratification vote by the 2,700 striking workers was set for Friday.

If the agreement is approved, the factories in Dayton could resume production the same day. GM said most other plants could be back in operation seven days after parts shipments from Dayton resume.

ARMY MAY SCREEN EXTREMISTS

WASHINGTON (AP) — To keep out white supremacist and other hate group influences, the U.S. Army should begin screening for extremist views and activities during recruitment and basic training, an Army task force said Thursday.

The task force said that it found minimal evidence of extremism in the ranks but that many soldiers see illegal gang activity as a bigger threat to their security.

In announcing the results of a two-month investigation of the prevalence of extremism in the service, Army Secretary Togo West said he was confident the problem was small.

Nevertheless, he said the Army would study how and whether recruits could be screened on their views toward extremism. "That will be a very touchy examination," West said, given the risk of infringing on First Amendment rights.

THE BIG BREAK

■ Students travel, relax; authorities warn of dangers while traveling

Nikki Prentice
staff reporter

The famous words of the week are spring break. Some students have been counting down since winter break, and finally, it is here.

Some students will visit exotic destinations or find themselves wallowing in snow drifts. Yet others will enjoy a relaxing week on the couch at home — sans classes.

While traditional spring break spots, like South Padre Island, Texas, are popular among student travelers, the increasing interest in slot machines and gambling is directing students westward.

"A few students are going to Las Vegas," said Beverly McVey, travel consultant for Creative Travel in Manhattan.

"They have been to the South already, so a lot of the older students are going to Las Vegas and also skiing," she said.

McVey said skiing packages have a minimum stay of five nights, while hot spots in Mexico have restrictions of three- to four-night reservations.

"There's no set price on the trips. It depends on what you want and the hotel you pick that determines price," McVey said.

Always carry plastic and travelers checks while traveling and if flying, prepare a carry-on bag to take on the plane with items that will be necessary for the next 24 hours, just in case luggage is misplaced.

"If you lose your airline ticket, always be prepared to pay for a return flight," McVey said.

"You will have to buy a return flight up front and pay a $60 non-refundable fee for research, to see if ticket is ever used," she said.

If a student loses an airplane ticket then finds the lost ticket, the student needs to return the found ticket to the airline. At that time, if the ticket is unused, the student will receive a refund for the amount paid for the return-flight ticket.

"Your airplane ticket is just like cash," McVey said. "Keep up with it at all times."

Everyone wants to enjoy spring break, but too much fun can leave you facing the law.

According to the U.S. Department of State Bureau of Consular Affairs, more than 2,200 American citizens were arrested while abroad last year. The arrests primarily dealt with drugs and alcohol abuse in public.

"Just because you are an American citizen doesn't mean you are exempt from the laws in another country," said Suzanne Lawrence, press officer for the Bureau of Consular Affairs.

Once an American leaves the country, U.S. laws and constitutional rights no longer apply, Lawrence said.

"The truth is that Americans are expected to obey all laws, and those who break foreign laws face severe penalties while abroad," she said.

Punishments for possession of drugs on foreign soil can result in sentences up to 20 years in prison, depending on the country's regulations.

Possessing large quantities of drugs, known as drug trafficking, can result in the death penalty in some countries, Lawrence said.

In 1995, the average age of Americans arrested in Mexico was 30 years old. Mexico had the largest number of Americans arrests, averaging more than 750 arrests in 1995. Jamaica was second in line, with about 240 American arrests.

Ignorance of another country's legal system can ruin your vacation, Lawrence said.

"To have a safe trip, become familiar with the basic laws and customs of the country you plan to visit before you travel," Lawrence said. "Engage in no action or behavior that might result in your arrest and incarceration."

Aside from the danger of being thrown in jail, weather and alcohol-related accidents are other factors to consider.

Bill Arck, director of Alcohol and Other Drug Education Services, said to be aware of the danger involving alcohol and the climate. Drinking in the sun is just as harmful as mixing booze in cold weather.

"Alcohol dehydrates a drinker. It takes eight ounces of water to oxidize a can of beer from the body, so you are taking water from the system," Arck said.

The alcohol dilates blood vessels, which makes you more susceptible to the sun, he said.

Cold weather and alcohol is also a no-win situation, Arck said. In frigid conditions, alcohol releases the body's heat rather than preserving it.

When a person's blood-alcohol concentration is approximately below .05, a person begins to relax and release body heat. When B.A.C. increases above .05, a person will feel even colder, Arck said. The more a person drinks, the more body heat escapes from the body.

The legal alcohol-consumption limit in Kansas and around the nation is .08, but open-container laws and DUI regulations vary from state to state.

"If traveling, be aware of regulations," Arck said. "In some states, non-alcoholic beverages are considered cereal-malt beverages, and you can be charged with open container or minor in possession."

"Thinking you can swim or ski while drinking is not a good idea because of balance and how alcohol affects your system," Arck said.

Students driving long distances should have their vehicles tuned up before heading out of town, Terry Wark, manager of Wildcat Amoco, said.

"Plan ahead. Don't wait till the last minute to get stuff done on your car," he said.

"Always keep an eye on your gas gauge and make sure you get a major-brand gas. Don't buy just any side-station gasoline," he said.

Taking pre-trip precautions and being aware of certain regulations will help reassure spring vacation will be a snowball of fun or a relaxing stroll along the beach.

ALCOHOL RISK

► 50 to 70 percent of fatal falls are alcohol-related. 50 percent of broken-bone accidents have alcohol involved. 69 percent of drownings are alcohol-related; 50 percent of skiing accidents are alcohol-related; 79 percent of victims of assaults have been drinking, and 62 percent of all assaults are alcohol-involved.

CAR CHECK-UP

► Check oil and other fluids, and if the oil needs changing, make sure it is done before departing. Brake checks and inspection of the exhaust system are also good ideas, Wark said. Wark also reminds students to keep a jack and spare tire in the truck. Carry a flashlight and some food for emergencies.

COMMENTARY

University lacks physically distinguishable concepts, monuments

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

K-State may or may not be a real place — not a place in the literal sense of the word, but in the conceptual sense.

Washington, D.C., easily distinguished by its monuments and iconic federal buildings, is a real place. When you are there, you can grasp the surroundings as a truly unique place.

Manhattan, Kansas, is not so simple. Every decent-sized town in Kansas has a Wal-Mart and a McDonald's — so what makes Manhattan a unique place? What makes K-State its own place?

Over the past week we have looked at different concepts of space at K-State. Tying this space together into one, coherent form would, conceivably, create a unified place.

As we walk across campus, through buildings, and into our classrooms or offices, we proceed through space. This space can be appealing or it can be drab.

As humans, we need our space. In a classroom, students generally sit every other seat if space provides. We need our own domain — whether that is our bedroom or an arms-length radius of emptiness in a classroom. Closer than that, it becomes uncomfortable.

This human condition makes the space we occupy all the more important. Imagine K-State, with no grass or trees, as only pavement. Would a walk through campus be nearly as enjoyable?

In brochures and advertisements for K-State, what picture or image is always the focus? Anderson Hall. This space on campus is ideally pastoral. It's the image we all expect for a true university campus. Sadly, this is where that image begins and ends.

To see where campus planning has gotten K-State in the past 20 years, one can look to the north of Claflin Road. This section of campus, such as Call and Weber halls, is designed around one concept: the car.

These new buildings open onto parking lots, not green quads.

Even Throckmorton Hall, though quite new, sits practically on the street, disallowing any reflection as one approaches it. As soon as you cross the street, you are engulfed in a descending plaza and swallowed up whole into the doors.

How does the south campus relate to this suburban growth to the north?

The one feature unique to all buildings at K-State is their use of native limestone. Sometimes, even this obvious connection is not enough. K-State is a complex campus to fully understand.

At one end of the spectrum is the overbuilt southwest: Durland Hall, the K-State Student Union and Seaton Hall. At the other end of the spectrum, you can drive so far north as to encounter a country atmosphere with dirt roads, barns, fences and herds of animals roaming about — and, yet, you are still on campus. Building mistakes like Bluemont Hall dominate their parcel of campus with little concern for other structures, such as the undeservedly-hidden Dickens Hall.

Other buildings, like Lafene Health Center, divide the campus into smaller plots and augment the hodgepodge quality of open space.

Although K-State may lack many elements of good design, it is still a usable, admired place.

If the space is not offered, we create it for ourselves. This is the reason one can see so many students sitting on steps, retaining walls and curbs across campus: This gathering space is not readily available, so they make do.

Things are slowly changing on this campus. The addition to Farrell Library doesn't pay homage to the street, but turns itself to the campus, offering a long, open-armed, arched corridor from the middle of campus to its front door. Union expansion offers the tempting idea of finally doing something with Union Plaza instead of leaving it as an abandoned street.

There are other things that could be done, however.

While talking with Robert Condia's fifth-year architecture design class about space on campus, a recurring comment was the College of Architecture and Design's faculty were rarely invited to actively participate in campus planning and design.

The complaint from the class was administrators make decisions about buildings based on little experience. Architects have the culture but none of the power.

In order to keep mistakes from being made in the future, K-State can no longer treat students and faculty as clients and employees, respectively.

We must include all community members in our design decisions if we are ever to have communal ownership of our spaces.

In the past, campus planners have designed many outdoor and building schemes to better develop the campus. What they lacked was the commitment of administrators and, most of all, money.

Space series
This is the fifth in a series of five articles concerning and evaluating different concepts of space on the K-State campus which will appear daily this week. Russell Fortmeyer is a junior in architectural engineering and an observer of campus planning, design and history.

Checklist of things to do over spring break

QUICKread

► We came up with a quick list of things to do over spring break for the four students who came to campus today.

- ☐ Achieve no tan lines.
- ☐ Fail to study for anything.
- ☐ Don't sleep on your back; you could choke to death if you throw up while asleep.
- ☐ Don't pass out on your stomach.
- ☐ Call your parents at least once.
- ☐ Buy souvenirs.
- ☐ Get your hair done.
- ☐ Get pictures so they'll have something to hold against you when you run for office.
- ☐ Don't inhale.
- ☐ Explore new alternatives in personal relationships. Don't rope yourself in. (Unless that's what you're into, of course.)
- ☐ Ski naked, water or snow.
- ☐ Know emergency first aid for frostbite.
- ☐ Be an extra in "Attack from Mars."
- ☐ Accept no strange packages or body searches at the airport.
- ☐ They don't do body searches at state borders.
- ☐ Blow up the condoms first to check for holes.
- ☐ When considering body art, keep it tasteful and inconspicuous.
- ☐ They do, however, check for vegetables and cacti at some state borders.
- ☐ Remember, always wear clean underwear, even if it's on your head.

Stereotypes are 1st step to discrimination

All of us have a concept of what discrimination entails. Usually when the term comes up, we automatically think of discrimination as something that affects women, minorities or gays.

Of course there is discrimination that affects all three of these groups. Pat Buchanan is living proof of that. My worry is many people, even those who aren't sexist, racist or homophobic, display subtle trends toward discrimination in everyday life.

It seems to be true that everyone needs to be able to look down on someone in some way. For example, when many people see me, they figure the long hair must mean I'm a drug-abusing, unmotivated, do-nothing who will obviously never amount to anything.

Conversely, when long-haired or alternative types see average-looking people, they tend to pity them because of what they consider a narrowness of mind. They can even be downright vicious when discussing guys in cowboy hats.

Neither of these stereotypes are true. However, even though I'm convinced that most, if not all the people doing the stereotyping, have met counter-examples to these generalizations, they persist in doing it.

This is also readily on display in a university setting where many seem to believe their education makes them superior to all those who don't have one. For example, I was recently talking to an intelligent woman who said she believed industrial workers could never be depended upon to govern themselves and needed the paternal supervision of the bourgeois for their own benefit.

Now I don't know how many industrial workers she's met, but most of those I've been in contact with seemed to possess at least enough common sense to take care of themselves. They might not be up on the most newfangled social theories, but you know, if any of the newfangled social theories were worth a rat's sphincter, common sense would have figured them out a long time ago.

Even at the University, many seem to hold that those in certain majors are deficient in some way. On one side, you have those who believe all agriculture majors are hicks, and the other believing all art majors are flakes. Neither viewpoint even comes close to the truth.

And then there's the big one. Greeks versus non-greeks. I don't have to go into all the stereotypes held on both sides of this issue. They've been covered more in depth many times before. You know, though, I'd bet anyone who has a good amount of exposure to either side realizes just how superficial the stereotypes are.

Perhaps you wonder why I'm bringing out so many stereotypes in an article on discrimination. It's because stereotyping is the first step on the road to outright discrimination. Before people can refuse someone a job based on a non-merit reason, they must first have a stereotypical view of how that person would perform.

Because of this, all stereotyping can be dangerous. Once your mind has accepted as a fact there are people you are superior to, there is little difference between yourself and the racist, sexist homophobes. In fact, it could be said that at least these people are more out front and forward about their beliefs.

Don't let yourself slip into this trap. Discrimination will never end until we truly make an effort to judge people on what they are and not on what groups they belong to.

Women deal differently with married men

Tuesday was my wife's and my fourth wedding anniversary.

In the four years I have been married, I've noticed how differently I am treated now compared to when I was single. The most notable difference is how I'm treated by single women.

It is a myth that when you choose a spouse, you no longer want good friends of the same gender of that spouse. Yet making such friends can be perplexing at best, and at worst insulting.

The single women I've met since I've been married almost always limit our relationships to the status of casual acquaintances. It's as if we married men (and this may be thought about married women as well, for all I know) are perceived as either poor potential friends or safe people to flirt with by single members of the opposite sex.

My experience has been reinforced time and time again, so it's a little difficult to refute or explain away as simple isolated incidents and circumstances. Further strengthening my belief in the validity of my observations is the fact I've noticed the married women and all of the men I meet treat me the same whether they know I'm married or not.

With few exceptions (I can cite less than two dozen in four years), it has been my experience that whenever I meet a single woman, her early interest in my personality waxes until the moment I make mention of or she meets my wife, or she sees my wedding ring. Then her interest either immediately wanes or becomes fixed on Scott the married man, which is but one facet of my personality and life.

Whenever one of these women who no longer care to get to know me in any meaningful way meet me again, they ask "How are you?" One of the next questions is inevitably, "So how is your wife?" Sometimes they just skip to the second question.

I find it fascinating so many single women, most of whom have never met my wife and hardly know me at all, are so concerned about my spouse's well-being.

After a few years of this, I began delaying telling the women I would meet that I was married. I hoped maybe they'd get to know me, and we would establish a burgeoning friendship. Hopefully, when I did spring my marital status on them later, they'd want to remain friends.

This approach had worse results. Women with whom I had only the most casual of conversations with were furious with my lack of disclosure. "How could you lie to me like that?" they would ask me bitterly.

The only lies I could have been guilty of were those of omission. I've never claimed I wasn't married. Besides, whether I was married or not was irrelevant, because I've never even hinted that I wanted anything but platonic relationships. What I found was that wanting a platonic but real relationship with a single woman was the thing that was usually an irrelevant issue.

I haven't described much about my experiences with the "touchy-feely" single women I've met over the years. Their outward behavior seems more friendly, but their interests (and any other married man, undoubtedly) are just as shallow as those of their more aloof counterparts.

These women seem certain that because I am married they can flirt with me as much as they want to, and the most I can do within any semblance of moral behavior is to flirt back. Hence these friendships revolve around flirting and nothing else, which is no more rewarding than those based on exchanging niceties. It's a good thing my wife isn't the jealous type.

Even the single women I've known longest since I've been married remain in these two categories of behavior. Some of them extend themselves occasionally by getting to know Scott the human being a little. But just a little.

In spite of it all, I wouldn't be single again. I love my wife, a woman who is my friend on all levels, far too much to give up my relationship with her for those who use my commitment to her as a barrier to meaningful friendships.

SCORES SHOULDN'T BE PUBLIC

Editor,

Although I agree that some measure of teacher effectiveness would be useful to students choosing courses and professors, I disagree with TEVAL scores being made public.

TEVAL cannot be a measure of good teaching for departmental uses, a source of ideas for teaching improvement to be used by professors and an indicator for student of teaching quality, all at the same time. A single survey instrument cannot serve multiple purposes.

If you want to provide information helpful to students, I suggest asking a group of students to create a brief, say a five-question, survey to be completed for each class each semester. This questionnaire would deal with the issues important to students. Publish the results.

My own view is that a single question, such as "How effective is this professor?" would get at the central issue best.

► TRACK AND FIELD

Spring break travel plans for K-State tracksters kick off outdoor season

Trevor Grimm
staff writer

While some K-State students might be headed for exotic Texas and Louisiana locales such as Padre Island or New Orleans, the Wildcat track team will spend spring break at somewhat less-exciting cities in those two states.

For athletes who compete primarily in outdoor events, the two meets will represent their first opportunity of the year to compete.

"You've got a lot of kids whose primary event is outdoors, such as javelin or discus," K-State coach Cliff Rovelto said. "For those people who did a lot indoors, it's only been a month since the Big 8 Championships."

The indoor season ended for most athletes Feb. 24 at the Big 8 Championships in Lincoln, Neb. The NCAA Championships were March 8 and 9 in Indianapolis.

The Baylor and Southwest Louisiana meets will give Rovelto his first look at this year's squad. Rovelto said it is too early to tell who will be looked upon for leadership this year.

"It's too early. A lot of people have been all-American and so forth. You kind of expect them to lead the team," Rovelto said.

The Cats will need young athletes to step up early in the season if the Cats are to be successful, according to Rovelto.

"We've got a lot of young people," Rovelto said. "For us to be a good team, people have to be able to compete right away."

At the Baylor Relays, K-State will face the likes of Stephen F. Austin and Southwest Texas State.

The Southwest Louisiana Invitational will feature Mississippi, Louisiana Tech, Northeast Louisiana and Stephen F. Austin.

The two meets kick off a nine-meet schedule for the Cats.

► INTRAMURAL BASKETBALL CHAMPIONSHIP

Purple Helmets win All-University title

Shane McCormick
contributing writer

Just like the finishes in the NCAA Tournament, the intramural playoff games have provided their share of excitement. Thursday's championship game was no different.

In the finals, it was Sigma Chi matched up against Purple Helmets. The Purple Helmets provided a thrilling comeback to grab the victory 53-49.

The game was tight from the beginning, with eight lead changes within the first 10 minutes of the game. Within that span, both teams combined for six three-pointers. Keith Sides, senior in business education, provided three of those for the Purple Helmets.

But at the 7:03 mark of the first half, Sigma Chi Mark Hall, senior in pre-physical therapy, hit a three-pointer to put his team up 22-17. Sigma Chi grabbed the momentum from that shot and took it all the way the rest of the half.

At the end of the first period,

Sigma Chi found itself with a 29-19 lead.

Even though the Purple Helmets were down by 10, starting point guard Sides said the team was not too worried.

"We've been down the last three playoff games, so we knew we could stay in it," he said.

Sigma Chi came out in the second half and picked up right where it left off.

But Sides kept the Purple Helmets in the game with his long-range bombs. At the 15:30 mark, Sides hit his fourth three-pointer of the game, pulling his team to within eight. The Purple Helmets were able to pull within six at the 14:32 mark with a nice turn-around jumper by Jarrett Grosdidier, junior in pre-dentistry.

But Sigma Chi pushed the lead back to eight with a 20-foot jump shot by Kenny Holwick, junior in milling science management. Holwick paced Sigma Chi with 15 points.

A fast-break layup by Holwick gave Sigma Chi its biggest lead of the night at the 9:31 mark of the second half, giving his team a 41-30 lead.

The Purple Helmets started to chip away at the lead with a three-pointer by Sides and a lay-in by Brian Lojka, senior in life sciences.

But it was at the 6:04 mark where the Purple Helmets grabbed the momentum. Trailing 41-36, Troy Hackney, freshman undecided, hit a big three-pointer that cut the lead to just two. Two possessions later, Hackney hit another three-pointer to give the Purple Helmets its first lead of the second half.

"After the first three-pointer, I started feeling it, and I just was looking to hit another one while I was hot," Hackney said.

On the next possession, Sigma Chi was able to grab back the lead with a jump shot by Holwick, to give his team a 43-42 lead.

But two possessions later, at the 2:55 mark, Sides was there again to provide a response. Sides hit his seventh and final three-pointer of the game to give his team a two-point lead. Sides led all scorers with 25 points.

"The last couple of nights I haven't been shooting pretty good, but I got off to a good start tonight," Sides said. "When the shots start to fall, you just try to keep shooting and hope they go in."

The Purple Helmets seemed to have the game wrapped up with a 52-47 lead with just 25 seconds left, but Sigma Chi refused to give up.

With 10 seconds left, David Butts, freshman in engineering, made a lay up and was fouled on the play. Butts missed the free throw but his team only trailed by three.

"We just couldn't get the defensive rebounds in the end," Sigma Chi Steven Taylor, freshman in civil engineering, said.

"If we could have gotten those rebounds, we could have maybe sent it into overtime."

Holwick said the difference in the game was the intensity of the Purple Helmets in the second half.

"They just came out in the second half and wanted it more than we did," he said. "They came out and turned up their defense."

► CREW

Team spends break in Texas practicing for regatta

John Berggren
staff writer

The K-State crew men's, women's and high school teams won't spend spring break loafing like most other students might while on vacation.

The crew teams will spend their break in Waco, Texas, training on the Brazos River for their first home regatta April 6 in the Sunflower State Championships at Tuttle Creek.

However, this spring-training event won't mark the team's first practice, men's crew captain Wally Margheim and Coach Al Koch said.

"We practice year around to stay in shape," Margheim said. "When we can't be on the water, we lift (weights), run and row on our machines. We go down there because it's warmer than it is here. We've been out on the water three or four weeks, but we've had to dodge some ice on Tuttle."

"We've been on the water sporadically out at Tuttle in February and March, and it has helped us get in a lot better shape," Koch said. "We're hoping to go to Waco to work on our technique and timing and to build up our endurance."

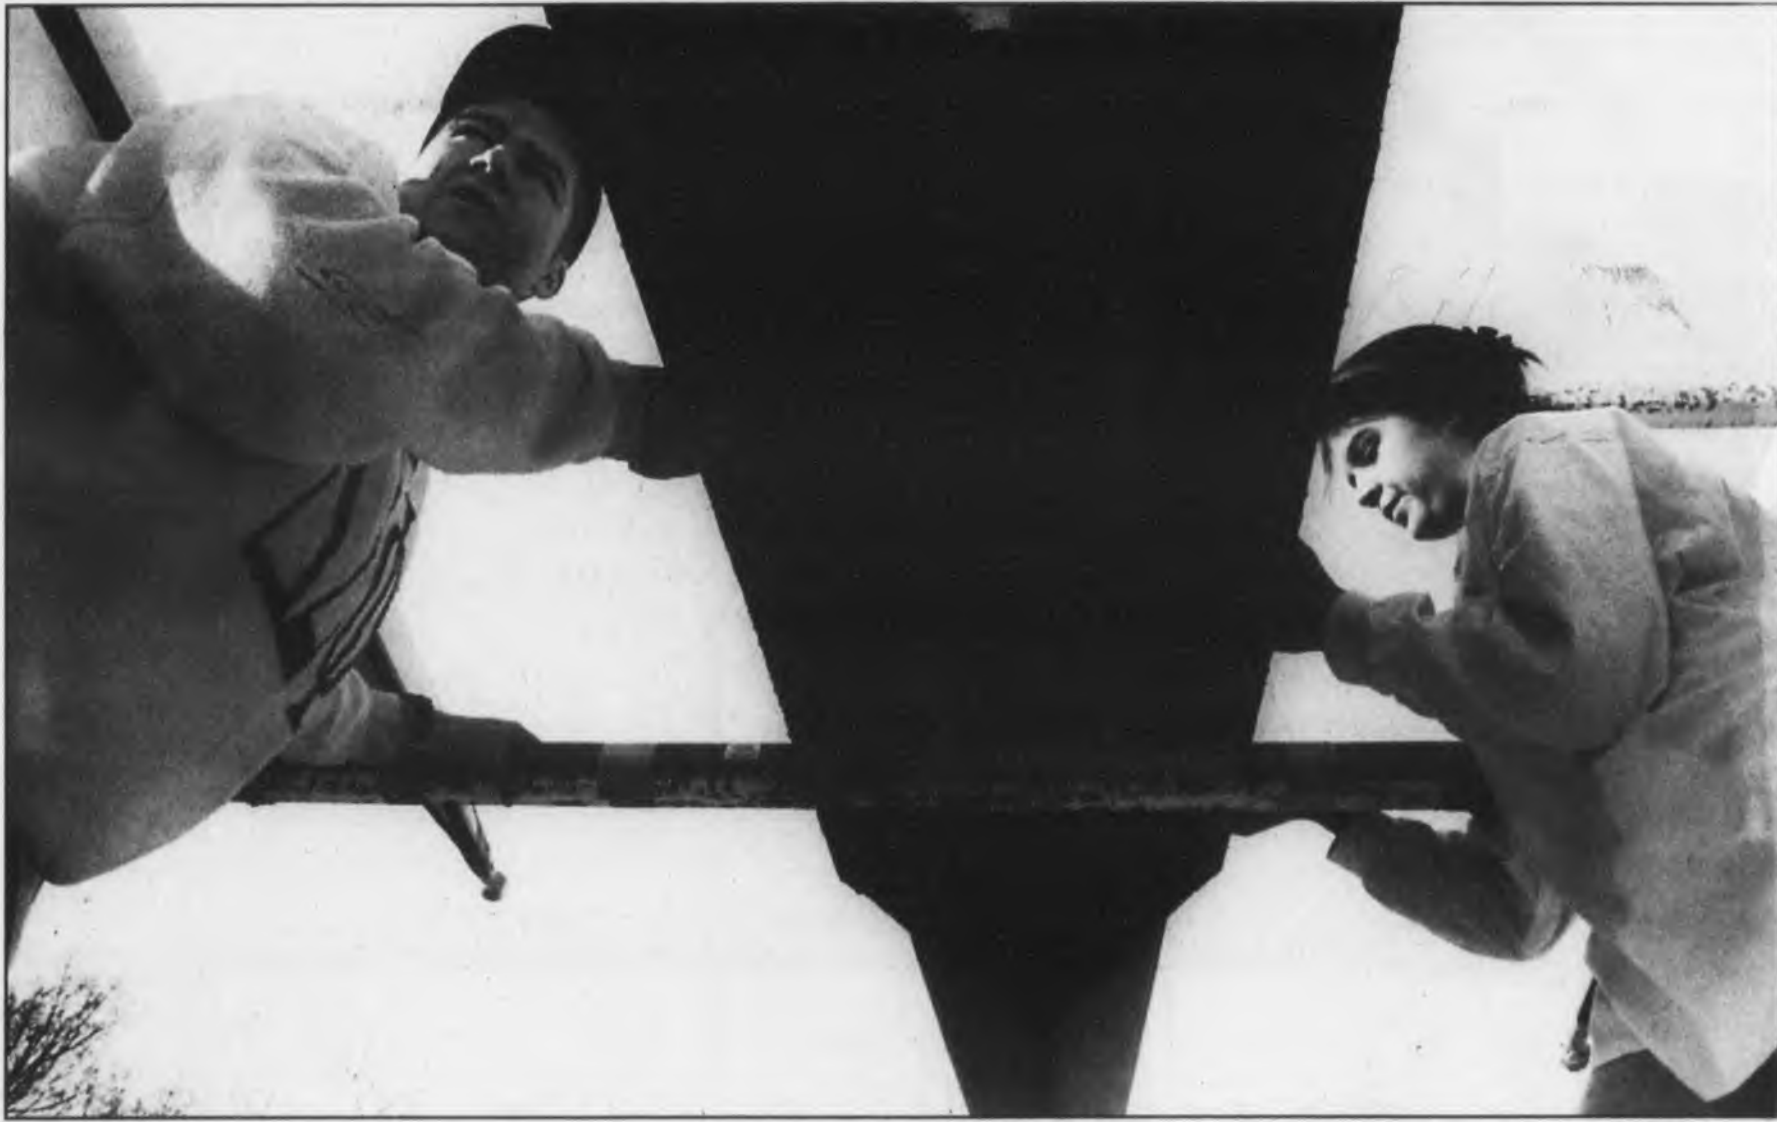

Margheim said there was a lot that needed to be accomplished in Waco.

"We've only got 10 veterans on our varsity team, and we need the new people to mainly work on their form," Margheim said. "The seasoned varsity will mainly just be working on form and all the teams will work on being cohesive with each other."

Koch agreed that his youth needed the experience. "We don't have much for experienced varsity rowers," Koch said. "All the new rowers that we have have gained a great deal from when they started."

The event ends on March 31 with a preseason regatta with Wichita State, Washburn, Tulsa, Oklahoma State, Texas and Colorado, all of whom are practicing on the Brazos next week.

"The regatta at the end is the first one of the spring and it helps us quite a bit in seeing how we match-up against other teams in the region," Koch said. "This week is a big advantage for us because it helps us gain a lot of experience going into the regular season."

Sluggers try to extinguish UIC's Flames

Shana Newell
sports editor

The K-State baseball team will finish its nine-game home stand to start the spring break as it plays host to the University of Illinois at Chicago baseball team Saturday and Sunday.

Saturday's game will begin at 2 p.m. at Frank Myers Field, while Sunday's doubleheader will start at noon.

The Flames, a Division I school, come to Manhattan with a 4-6 record for the season to try to stop the Cats' winning season. It will be the first time the teams have met.

K-State, 14-7 on the season and 1-1 in conference play, completed its first Big 8 competition of the season Wednesday.

In a doubleheader with Oklahoma State, ranked No. 20 in the nation, K-State handed the Cowboys their first Big 8 loss of the season with an 8-0 shutout. The Cats split the doubleheader, losing 7-6 in the second game of the afternoon.

K-State expects to start right-hander Kevin Wicker and lefties Chris Traylor and Jon Oiseth against the Flames.

The rotation has not been finalized. Wicker enters the series with a 3-1 record and a 5.57 ERA. Traylor is 1-0 with a 6.60 ERA. Oiseth leads the trio with a 3-0 record and a 3.98 ERA.

The Cats' pitching staff is coming off back-to-back shutouts. Oiseth and relievers Brian Thompson, Mickey Blount and Jake Voos combined for a 12-0 shutout of Regis University last Sunday. Starter Matt Koeman and Thompson combined for the shutout of the Cowboys.

It was the first back-to-back shutouts by Cats hurlers since Chris Hmielewski and Dave Christensen shut out Friends University in a doubleheader in 1991.

K-State's batters should face left-hander Brandon Allen in the first game of the series. Allen is 2-0 on the season with a 2.45 ERA.

Sunday's competition should start off easier as the Flames expect to start right-hander Tom Szymborski, who is 0-1 on the season with a 7.27 ERA.

Jason Henry, 0-1 with a 7.11 ERA, is expected to start the last game of the series.

Coach Mike Clark was unavailable for comment.

The Cats head to Norman, Okla., for a two-game series on Tuesday and Wednesday before returning to the friendly confines of Frank Myers Field for a three-game series with Iowa State next weekend.

The Sooners are ranked No. 21 in the nation, while the Cyclones are struggling with a 1-13 record.

The Cyclones' one win came with a 22-8 victory over Kansas earlier this month.

► NCAA TOURNAMENT

Georgetown, Kentucky will advance to tourney's Elite 8

Associated Press

Georgetown had to sweat it out until the buzzer while Kentucky hardly broke a sweat.

The Hoyas and Wildcats both displayed superb depth and offensive firepower but advanced to the quarterfinals of the NCAA Tournament with contrasting victories Thursday night.

Georgetown (29-7) got 32 points from Allen Iverson, and the Hoyas held off a late Texas Tech rally for a 98-90 win in Atlanta. In the region's second semifinal, top-ranked Massachusetts (33-1) played Arkansas (20-12).

Kentucky (31-2) had just two starters play 25 minutes, and 10 Wildcats played more than 13 in a 101-70 rout of Utah in the Midwest Regional.

In the region's other game, Wake Forest (25-5) played Louisville (22-11).

Iverson made only 10 of 29 from the field, but scored six points during a 17-0 run in the second half that gave the Hoyas a 72-61 lead.

Jason Sasser led Texas Tech with 25 points, but his only points in the final 15 minutes came on a meaningless 3-point late in the game when Georgetown's lead was secure. Four Red Raiders fouled out.

In Minneapolis, Kentucky unleashed its fierce attack from the opening tip against the Utes, who suffered their worst loss since a 31-point loss to Brigham Young two years ago.

The 101 points were the most given up by the Utes since allowing 113 to BYU in 1984.

Utah had limited opponents to 63 points per game and hadn't given up more than 85 all year. Kentucky reached that total with 7:52 left, then played sloppily the rest of the way.

In Friday's games, Mississippi State (24-7) plays Connecticut (32-2) and Cincinnati (27-4) meets Georgia Tech (24-11) in the Southeast Regional at Lexington, Ky. In the West Regional at Denver, Georgia (21-9) meets Syracuse (26-8), and Kansas (25-5) plays Arizona (27-11).

Victor Page added 17 points for Georgetown and Jerome Williams 12 for the Hoyas, who made 33 of 46 free throws.

Iverson's quickness and ballhandling dictated the pace. The sophomore finished with five assists, four rebounds, four steals and only two turnovers in 38 minutes.

Cory Carr and Koy Smith each scored 16 for the Red Raiders, and Jason Martin had 12.

Antoine Walker had 19 points, eight rebounds and six assists as Kentucky moved within a victory of returning to the Final Four for the first time since 1993. The top-seeded Wildcats are seeking their first national title since 1978.

In the last two weeks, Mississippi State has beaten the fast (Kentucky) and the slow (Princeton). On Friday, the Bulldogs try to beat the big — Connecticut's backcourt.

When Mississippi State takes on the Huskies in the Southeast Regional semifinals, it'll be facing two talented 6-foot-5 guards, All-American Ray Allen and Doron Sheffer, the one-time star of Israel's national team.

"They are so much bigger than our guards that we're totally mismatched size-wise against them," said Richard Williams, whose team has won 13 of its last 15 games.

While Connecticut is the favorite in the Southeast, Mississippi State is the kind of team that scares favorites.

It's peaking now, having beaten Kentucky in the final of the Southeastern Conference tournament — the Wildcats' only conference loss all season — then beat Princeton, 63-41, after the Tigers had shocked defending champion UCLA.

The marquee matchup in the West also features point guards — Kansas' Jacque Vaughn and Arizona's Reggie Geary.

"We both have scoring balance, and Jacque Vaughn makes them go like Reggie Geary makes us go," Arizona coach Lute Olson said.

Oscar Picks

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

Everyone assumes the role of film critic when it comes to selecting the winners of the Academy Awards — the Oscars. It gives us a chance to reflect on the films that have touched our lives.

So, with little ado, I offer my predictions (who deserves to win and who will actually walk away the statuette):

Best Picture

Nominated "Babe," "Braveheart," "Apollo 13," "Sense and Sensibility" and "The Postman."

Should win "The Postman" is definitely tender and heart-warming, but no foreign movie will walk away with the award. "Sense and Sensibility," the only offering with fully-fleshed-out characters, charming dialogue and sumptuous settings, deserves to win.

Will win It's hard to deny the fact voters tend to go with more epic-scaled productions and mainstream fare. Sadly, "Apollo 13" has the ability to win, but the "Braveheart" epic tale will surely lure the majority of voters.

Best Director

Nominated Mike Figgis ("Leaving Las Vegas"), Mel Gibson ("Braveheart"), Chris Noonan ("Babe"), Michael Radford ("The Postman") and Tim Robbins ("Dead Man Walking").

Should win Chris Noonan's artful direction of the surprise-oinker "Babe" shouldn't go unnoticed. The one true original in the whole pack, he created a tender movie with a little, porcine hero that is almost too good.

Will win Mel Gibson's direction of lush countryside and epic battle scenes in "Braveheart" is one of the few sure-things for a win.

Best Actor

Nominated Richard Dreyfuss ("Mr. Holland's Opus"), Anthony Hopkins ("Nixon"), Sean Penn ("Dead Man Walking"), Nicolas Cage ("Leaving Las Vegas") and Massimo Troisi ("The Postman").

Should win Massimo Troisi's compassionate performance as the timid mailman who discovers love and poetry is one of those few masterful acts that go unnoticed.

Will win Nicolas Cage gives an alcoholic, abusive and ego-tripping performance in "Leaving Las Vegas." He's a definite shoe-in.

Best Actress

Nominated Elisabeth Shue ("Leaving Las Vegas"), Susan Sarandon ("Dead Man Walking"), Sharon Stone ("Casino"), Meryl Streep ("The Bridges of Madison County") and Emma Thompson ("Sense and Sensibility").

Should win Susan Sarandon is one of Hollywood's greatest actresses, and her work has gone unnoticed by the Academy. She's due, and this no-make-up, tear-jerking role as a nun is her time in the divine spotlight.

Will win Sarandon better be working on her speech.

Best Supporting Actor

Nominated James Cromwell ("Babe"), Tim Roth ("Rob Roy"), Kevin Spacey ("Usual Suspects"), Brad Pitt ("Twelve Monkeys") and Ed Harris ("Apollo 13").

Should win Kevin Spacey has emerged as a competent and driven actor. His clever performance in "Suspects" requires two screenings to really give him credit.

Will win Ed Harris is a survivor. Among his towering list of credits, he's done some really bad stuff, but "Apollo 13" isn't one of them. Another actor past his due, he'll walk off with Oscar.

Best Supporting Actress

Nominated Kate Winslet ("Sense and Sensibility"), Mare Winningham ("Georgia"), Kathleen Quinlan ("Apollo 13"), Mira Sorvino ("Mighty Aphrodite") and Joan Allen ("Nixon").

Should win "Nixon" didn't get near the respect it deserved, which makes Joan Allen's nomination a great chance to make amends. No matter, Allen's cold Pat Nixon is the only great performance in this pack.

Will win Woody Allen has good luck with his supporting actresses, so Sorvino could slip in here. However, Joan Allen should have Oscar to "kick around."

Kansas City to party with 4 nationally known ska bands

QUICKread

▶ A tour that started on the West Coast will bring three ska bands to Kansas City tonight at the Daily Grind. Another ska band on tour will also perform.

Phil Kellum
staff reporter

Four ska bands will have the Daily Grind in Kansas City hopping tonight with the beat.

Nationally known ska bands Let's Go Bowling, Mephiskapheles, Mustard Plug and solo ska artist Venice Shoreline Chris will be playing a show tonight at the Daily Grind.

Let's Go Bowling and Mephiskapheles are in the midst of a whirlwind tour that started on the West Coast and takes them across the country, and Venice Shoreline Chris is accompanying them on the jaunt. Mustard Plug is currently wrapping up its two-month-long "Bachelor Party" tour.

All four bands either have compact discs currently released by Moon SKA NYC, distributed by Moon SKA NYC or have CDs forthcoming from Moon SKA NYC.

Moon SKA NYC storefront office operator Noah Wildman describes Let's Go Bowling as "new traditionalist, minus the starch."

Let's Go Bowling hails from Fresno, Calif., and just released its newest CD, "Mr. Twist," on Moon SKA NYC. It blends traditional '60s-style ska with a tiny bit of a modern twist on the sound.

"Let's Go Bowling will force a guy to grab a partner of their preference and skank crazily, so if you go alone, don't — grab your gal or guy and dance!" Wildman said.

Mandy Stone, junior in wildlife biology, said, "Let's Go Bowling is always consistent, and they play a long time. I've seen them a lot, but I'll still go see them."

Mephiskapheles, from New York City, is one of the more unusual bands on the ska scene nowadays. Wildman describes it as "simply Satanic." It is touring in support of its CD, "God Bless Satan."

Mephiskapheles claims to be Satanic ska, with its stickers and patches saying, "Satanic Ska For The Whole Family." It mixes a bit of a metal edge into its fun brand of ska. It played at Berlin last July with Ed Hall.

"Mephiskapheles is nutty. It's not the pinnacle of traditional ska, but it put on a good show. It'll be cool to see it again, because not many people saw it when it was here before," Stone said.

The band recently got back from playing some shows in Hawaii, where it was well received.

Venice Shoreline Chris will be playing a short set between Mephiskapheles and Let's Go Bowling. He is the former lead singer of King Apparatus, a ska band from Toronto. Chris plays solo acoustic ska and rock steady.

Mustard Plug, from Grand Rapids, Mich., will open the show. Its style of ska mixed with upbeat punk will set the crowd in motion and keep it on its feet and dancing all night.

After it wraps up its current tour, Mustard Plug will go into the studio and record the follow-up to its debut CD, "Big Daddy Multitude," which was released back in 1992.

"I'll be dancing for the whole show. I'm really glad this show is happening. It's really something to look forward to. It's going to be a hip-happenin' time," Stone said.

"The audience can expect a well-rounded ska experience," Wildman said.

Committee chooses new vicepresident

Member of grant-writing team earns office in national association

Brent Smitko
staff reporter

A member of the information technology grant writing team at K-State will serve as vice president of the National University Continuing Education Association for 1996-97.

"It's an exciting professional opportunity," Sue Maes said.

Maes was chosen for the position by a nominating committee, chaired by Dan Shannon, the dean of continuing education at the University of Wisconsin at Milwaukee, Maes said.

Tom Hatfield, dean of continuing education at the University of Texas, was a member of the nominating committee and was pleased that such a creative person was named to the position.

"It really was an easy decision," Hatfield said.

"She has remarkable talents in several dimensions and has been a long-standing member of the association," he said.

Melinda Sinn, the public information coordinator for continuing education at K-State, agreed that Maes' experience and activeness were reasons she was selected.

The association has a membership of nearly 3,000 educators and after applying the criteria for vice president that number was narrowed to 25, Hatfield said.

Maes now will serve on the organization's board of directors and its executive committee during the next year.

If the committee approves of Maes' work, then she can be placed on the slate to run for vice president again the following year, she said.

As vice president, Maes is required to review records of all votes that take place in the association, such as changes within the association that are voted on, she said.

The annual conference for the National University Continuing Education Association will be on March 29, and Maes will begin her year-long term. Plans will also be announced by the president for the upcoming year at that time.

Along with the vice president position, Maes will continue her work with the grant-writing team at K-State.

This position consists of working on extramural funding for technology and mediated instruction, she said.

"I enjoy seeing new ideas and possibilities come together," Maes said.

Prior to her current position, Maes served as the director of Academic Outreach and has been involved in grant work for various projects.

Maes is a founding member and the senior associate of the Rural Clearinghouse for Lifelong Education and Development, a national organization that works to advocate access for rural adults to higher education.

She also was the executive director of UFM, a local community education program, from 1969 to 1985.

► STUDENT ACTION TEAM

Group promotes healthy lifestyles

■ KSU chapter plans events to help students make safe decisions

 Marci McNeal
staff reporter

Our group is just getting their feet wet. Next year we're going to take off running and get the word out about some serious issues that affect everybody.

 PAUL ENGLISH
S.A.T. PRESIDENT

A group of K-State students is tackling some important issues through a new group called the Student Action Team.

The S.A.T. concept was developed by Eastern Michigan University through a grant starting in 1990 and was built to support residence hall decision making and to encourage healthy lifestyles.

The president of the K-State chapter of S.A.T. became aware of the group at the Mid-West Affiliate of College and University Residence Halls Conference.

"I was attending the conference because I'm also the Association of Residence Halls Educational Programming chair," said Paul English, president of the K-State team and junior in history.

English attended the S.A.T. program and was told that 12 regional schools in this conference had S.A.T. teams, and he said he thought it would benefit the K-State campus to look into this organization further.

Then when English returned from the conference in December, he gathered a group of 15 interested people who wanted to learn about the group.

"Paul started talking with ARH about the possibility of having a S.A.T. group at K-State, and that's how I became aware about the group," said Holly McCormack, treasurer and acting vice president of the KSU Student Action Team and freshman in animal science and industry.

McCormack said the group worked hard to write the S.A.T.'s constitution and to get ARH to provide the funding for the group.

"Our goal for the K-State S.A.T. group is to do programs about critical issues to benefit the residence halls, but we more than welcome off-campus residents to come join our programs and meetings," McCormack said.

English said membership is open to anyone, but voting privileges and officer positions are held for residence hall members only.

The K-State chapter of S.A.T. has been active since December and has several events in the works to get the organization out in the public eye.

"The biggest event we're planning is tentatively planned for April 25 and will be a 'Take Back The Pride' march," English said.

English said the event is adapted from "Take Back The Night," an event when women and men who have been raped come out to the public and name the names.

"We want our event to focus on more of the positive," English said. "More campus lighting and self-defense classes focus on defenses against sexual violence, not on the prevention of it, and we need to make this step forward."

The "Take Back the Pride" event will focus around a march through the campus to the Union free-speech zone, a candlelight vigil and a speaker to end the event.

"My goal is to have 1,000 people participating in the march, and I'd like to see a lot of men out supporting this event," English said.

Other activities of the S.A.T. group will include a Sex Bowl between the halls, with teams representing each hall and teams from the ARH executive board and staff members from the halls.

"This event is like a quiz bowl but with questions about sex and other related questions," McCormack said.

The preliminary competition will be April 9 and 10 with the finals on the following Monday and Tuesday. Prizes will be given.

"We also have a win-lose-or-draw program put together, in case any group would need a short presentation," English said.

The program is like Pictionary but with shocking facts about the picture being drawn.

"Our group is just getting their feet wet. Next year we're going to take off running and get the word out about some serious issues that affect everybody," English said.

► KANSAS LEGISLATURE

Snyder seeks registration for recruiters

TOPEKA (AP) — K-State football coach Bill Snyder urged a legislative committee Thursday to endorse a bill that would require sports agents to register with the secretary of state's office if they recruit Kansas college athletes.

Snyder told the Senate Federal and State Affairs Committee the measure would protect young athletes from unscrupulous agents.

"Often an agent will misinform a student," he said.

Some agents will jeopardize a student athlete's eligibility to play by persuading them to sign a premature contract, Snyder said.

"They're for the most part a pretty seedy group," he said.

Under the bill, the secretary of state's office would develop rules for sports agents who want to represent Kansas athletes attempting to enter professional sports. The office also would be able to impose civil penalties if agents violate regulations.

► FORT RILEY

Ceremony renames a headquarters division

■ First Infantry Division Headquarters flags go to Germany

Associated Press

FORT RILEY — Fort Riley said goodbye to one unit and welcomed another March 29 as part of the transition to a smaller army.

The 2nd Brigade, 1st Infantry Division, was renamed the 3rd Brigade, 1st Armored Division, in an hour-long ceremony at this historic northeast Kansas Army post.

The soldiers assigned to the unit will remain the same and will remain at Fort Riley.

The 2nd Brigade colors will move to Germany and remain part of the 1st Infantry Division, which moved its headquarters to Germany last month.

The 1st Infantry Division had been assigned to Fort Riley since 1955.

Fort Riley has about 11,500 soldiers, down from about 15,000 before troop reductions began in June 1995.

The post retains two combat brigades, one each belonging to the 1st Infantry Division and the 1st Armored Division.

About 200 family, friends and retired soldiers stood in cold weather as Maj. Gen. Randolph House, the post commander, reviewed the history of the 2nd Brigade.

The 1st Infantry Division band played for the last time before disbanding and transferring to different posts. The ceremony concluded with a 19th-century cavalry charge by the Commanding Generals Mounted Color Guard, a ceremonial horse cavalry unit of about a dozen soldiers.

The color guard will remain at Fort Riley.

Habitat builds 1st Manhattan home

■ Ceremony celebrates completion of local house valued at about $50,000

 Kris Bethes
staff reporter

Becky Siders could not stop smiling as friends and family hugged and congratulated her on her new home.

"I'm flying," Siders, a K-State employee, said.

The Siders were chosen among numerous applicants to be recipients of the first house built by the local chapter of Habitat for Humanity International in Manhattan.

Siders' children, 12-year-old Vanessa and 10-year-old Carl, also showed their excitement by bouncing around and chatting excitedly about their new home.

The dedication and blessing of the Siders' home was 3 p.m. Sunday at 717 Riley Lane. A crowd of about 50 people came to see the ribbon-cutting ceremony and toured the three-bedroom home.

The Siders' home will cost them $35,000 interest-free, but it's valued at about $50,000.

Ronnie Whalen, Manhattan HFHI president, thanked volunteers and gave recognition to the construction committee and to people who donated necessary materials.

Tears came to Whalen's eyes as she expressed her gratitude for all the help.

"Because of you, a dream has come true," she said.

Bruce Snead, city commissioner and HFHI volunteer, shared some of his experiences and observations during the construction of the home.

"I saw only cooperation and harmony in getting the job done in the best way possible," Snead said.

He said he saw people who met new friends or saw old friends during the ebb and flow of working.

A Bible was presented to the family along with a toolbox and a family handyman book for easy repairs.

The toolbox and book were presented to aid in the house's maintenance, said Stephanie Thomas, family nurture committee chair of HFHI.

► CAMPUS BUILDINGS

Donor money often determines name

 Lynn Wuger
staff reporter

Naming buildings in honor of former University presidents and University officials was a trend on campus.

Now this trend is slowly diminishing, as buildings are more often being named in honor of private donors responsible for a large portion of the construction funding.

"There is a growing tendency to name buildings after private donors," Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said.

"With the way things are changing, most institutions are moving toward private support because of the expense involved with construction. Since buildings are being privately supported, it seems logical to name them for private individuals," he said.

Along with increased expenses, the lack of state funding for construction projects has led toward more private funding, said Jerry Carter, director of facilities planning/University architect.

"Reasonably, state money only provides one-third of the money needed to do construction on this campus," he said.

"So it only seems appropriate to name buildings after the donors."

Following this trend led to naming the new library expansion in honor of Joe and Joyce Hale.

The Hales, the largest private donors for the library, had no indication their name would be associated with the building when they donated the money, Hobrock said.

"The president decided it would be a nice gesture to name part of Farrell after the Hales and proposed the idea to them," he said.

"The Hales had to consent to the proposal before it moved any further."

Michelle Broccoli, administration officer for the University Vice President of the Administration and Finance, said after a proposal is drawn requesting the naming of a building, it is submitted to the Kansas Board of Regents by Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance.

"Normally, the proposal for a building name goes through the president first," Broccoli said.

"Then it is submitted to us, and Dr. Rawson gives it to the Board of Regents. Only the Board has the power to officially name a building on campus."

Once the proposal has been submitted to the Board, the matter is out of the hands of the University.

Also, according to Board bylaws regarding the naming of a building, no public communication of the proposed name can be made until it is presented for consideration to the open meeting of the committee.

After the approval from the Board is received, the University is allowed to announce the new name, and the process is completed.

"It may sound difficult, but the process is a great deal more informal than it appears," Carter said.

"There is more controversy at the beginning when the idea is first proposed than when it finally reaches the Board."

Even with the changing trend, a Wefald Hall in the future is still a possibility, Carter said.

"If circumstances allowed and another classroom building is built, President Wefald would certainly be considered," he said.

"But hopefully he will be with us for several more years, and we won't have to worry about it for a while."

► COLLEGIAN, ROYAL PURPLE WIN COLLEGIATE GOLD CROWN AWARDS

The K-State Collegian and Royal Purple were awarded the Columbia Scholastic Press Association's most prestigious award — Gold Crowns.

The Collegian was one of six newspapers to receive the Gold Crown, while the Royal Purple was one of two yearbooks to receive the honor.

Royal Purple staff also claimed 17 CSPA Gold Circle awards, which honor individual achievement.

The Collegian's Gold Crown, awarded for the 1994-95 school year, marks the fourth time the newspaper has won that award since 1989. The Collegian has also won Associated Collegiate Press Pacemakers two of the past three years.

"We worked really hard that semester, and I'm pleased that we're getting recognition for it," Stephanie Fuqua, fall 1994 Collegian editor, said.

The Royal Purple picked up its sixth-straight Gold Crown award, while the 1995 edition is a finalist for the ACP Pacemaker.

The Royal Purple is the only college yearbook to receive both nominations.

Other newspaper Gold Crowns went to the Oklahoma Daily (University of Oklahoma), the Indiana Daily Student (University of Indiana), the Auburn Plainsman (Auburn University), the Eastern Progress (Eastern Kentucky University) and the Oberlin Review (Oberlin College).

The other yearbook Gold Crown was awarded to the Commodore (Vanderbilt University).

N. Stewart Anderson, a senior in journalism from Osage City, was the Collegian editor during spring 1995. Todd Fleischer, a December 1995 public relations graduate, was the 1995 Royal Purple editor.

► CITIZENS SEEK PASSPORTS

HONG KONG (AP) — Raymond and Grace Chan argued up to the last minute about whether to apply for British passports.

He said it was like an insurance policy. She said it made her feel loyal to her Chinese heritage.

In the end they filed their applications — along with more than 160,000 people who mobbed the Hong Kong passport office this month to beat a midnight deadline on Sunday.

"I have my roots here.

I'm used to Hong Kong. Why should I get a British passport?" asked Grace Chan, 43.

"It's like insurance," replied her husband, 45. "It ensures we can visit our kids in Sydney like we do every year."

Britain's 155-year government of Hong Kong expires June 30, 1997.

While the approach of Chinese rule has had many worried about the future of Hong Kong's democratic freedom, the issue of the day Sunday was getting a passport.

► YELTSIN CALLS FOR PEACE PLAN

MOSCOW (AP) — Desperate to show voters he will stop the war that is sinking his presidency, Boris Yeltsin on Sunday announced a halt to combat operations in Chechnya, limited troop withdrawals and a willingness to hold indirect talks with the rebels' leader.

But his peace plan stopped short of promising an end to the fighting and left scant hope for an imminent settlement.

Yeltsin refused to budge on the separatists' two main demands, full withdrawal of Russian troops and independence for Chechnya.

The announcement came just 11 weeks before Russia's presidential election, with the unpopular Yeltsin trailing Communist Gennady Zyuganov and voters demanding an end to the bloodshed in Chechnya.

It also capped a month of withering air and ground attacks on Chechen strongholds, apparently intended to push the rebels into the southern mountains before the plan was announced.

K-State receives 3 research grants

Brett Mast
staff reporter

The U.S. Department of Defense has awarded six grants, averaging $375,000 each, to Kansas universities.

The money will be used to support research projects in science and engineering fields that are important to national defense.

Kansas is the only state to receive six awards, Peter Sherwood, K-State chemistry professor, said.

"It is a mark of the state's growing scientific strength that six of its research proposals have been chosen for funding," Sherwood said. "The average was three."

K-State was awarded three of the six grants. Wichita State University received two grants, and the University of Kansas received one.

The grants are provided on a competitive basis by the Experimental Program to Stimulate Competitive Research (EPSCoR).

As director of the Kansas Department of Defense EPSCoR, Sherwood was in charge of narrowing the number of Kansas proposals from 59 to 15.

For any state to receive six research awards in a national competition is a remarkable achievement, said Timothy Donoghue, K-State vice provost for research.

"The Kansas scientific community has become very competitive," Donoghue said.

The amount of money these grants will provide is also significant, he said.

"These latest awards total more than $2 million over the next three years," Donoghue said. "Peter Sherwood is to be commended for directing a program of such high caliber and distinction."

Faculty members in charge of the research projects will be reporting directly to national research offices of the Army, Navy and Air Force, Sherwood said.

EPSCoR is designed to stimulate research opportunities in states that have traditionally received the least amount of federal support for university research, Sherwood said.

In order to receive funds from the federal program, the amount of money awarded must be matched with non-federal money.

The money awarded in these grants will be matched by the State of Kansas, Sherwood said.

The Department of Defense has pledged a total of $20 million to 35 academic institutions in 19 states that qualify for EPSCoR funds.

Since Kansas qualifies as an EPSCoR state, it also receives funding from the Department of Energy, the Environmental Protection Agency, the National Science Foundation and NASA, Sherwood said.

FINANCIAL AID

KU to offer direct student loans

QUICKread

The University of Kansas will join six other Big 8 schools in offering one-stop financial assistance. K-State began the program one year ago.

Associated Press

LAWRENCE — The University of Kansas will join dozens of other colleges and universities in direct-student loan business.

Students attending the university this fall semester won't have to wait in line at the bank to secure a college loan.

"We anticipate it will be one-stop shopping for the student," said Rachel Rademacher, associate director of financial aid at KU.

Under direct lending, the U.S. Department of Education is the lender. Loan funds are sent directly to colleges and universities, which cut checks to student borrowers.

The system bypasses all banks and loan-guarantee agencies that have served the traditional student loan market at KU.

About 7,500 KU students borrow

$45 million annually to attend the university. Nationally, the federal student loan program involves billions of dollars and millions of borrowers.

"It's not that we were unhappy with the service," Diane Del Buono, KU director of financial aid, said. "We just think we can provide better service."

Federal loan funds will be available to students one day after they submit an accurately completed promissory note, she said.

In addition, income-sensitive repayment options and a simplified repayment process could cut student loan defaults.

K-State started offering direct lending to freshman and sophomore students a year ago.

KU and the University of Oklahoma were the only Big 8 schools without direct lending.

1996 spring clean-up program schedule

SPACE SHUTTLE

Atlantis avoids bad weather, lands at Edwards Air Force Base

QUICKread

The shuttle dropped off Astronaut Shannon Lucid at the Russian space station Mir. Atlantis then attempted to land in Florida but faced bad weather.

Associated Press

EDWARDS AIR FORCE BASE, Calif. — Space shuttle Atlantis and its five astronauts streaked toward the California desert Sunday after cloudy skies prevented a Florida touchdown.

Atlantis was due to land just before sunrise at 5:29 a.m. PST, bringing to a close the crew's successful trip to the Russian space station Mir to drop off NASA astronaut Shannon Lucid.

Mission Control tried for two mornings in a row to send Atlantis to the Kennedy Space Center in Florida, but on both days thick, low clouds interfered.

Flight directors finally gave up and ordered commander Kevin Chilton and his crew to Edwards Air Force Base, where the weather was good.

"Appreciate all the effort you made to try to get us into KSC. A lot of folks are disappointed, but we're looking forward to going back to California," Chilton, a Los Angeles native, said.

Chilton and his crew fired the braking engines one hour before touchdown, beginning Atlantis' descent.

NASA prefers landing the space shuttles at their Florida home port because of the nearly $1 million cost involved in ferrying them across the country atop a modified jumbo jet.

It also saves time preparing shuttles for their next flights — in Atlantis' case, a trip back to Mir in August to pick up Lucid.

Atlantis dropped Lucid off at the Russian station last week for a five-month stay.

She is the first American woman to live full time in orbit, aboard a space station.

Although cloudy skies in Florida prevented Atlantis from returning on Saturday, the shuttle almost had to land anyway when its cargo-bay doors would not open in orbit and allow heat to radiate into space.

Flight director Jeff Bantle said he would have ordered an emergency landing if the problem had continued 10 more minutes, but the two doors finally swung open and the shuttle was able to remain safely in orbit.

The 60-foot doors must be open while the shuttle is in orbit to dispel heat collected from electronics and other equipment.

They are closed several hours prior to landing. NASA blamed the problem on two frozen, malfunctioning microswitches.

NASA's next shuttle flight is a 10-day science voyage by Endeavour in mid-May.

Law goes against American traditions

QUICKread

► An law requiring English to be the official language of the United States is unnecessary.

One of the traditions Americans cherish is that we're a great melting pot. People of all nationalities, creeds and races come together and help make this country great.

But certain politicians are spitting on this tradition with the campaign promise to make English the official language of the United States.

With this law, which many states have already adopted, all official government documents would be in English, including voting ballots, applications for Social and Rehabilitative Services and driver's license exams.

There are arguments for and against the proposal, but the heart of the matter remains that the law is unnecessary.

English is one of the most difficult languages in the world to learn. Many immigrants have a difficult time assimilating into the culture and learning the language. But their children are often fluent in both languages.

This law is also unnecessary in the international business and science communities, which use English. People who need to know English to survive from day to day do.

This law is a backlash against immigration during the past 20 years. It's a backlash against the many Mexican and Vietnamese immigrants who have come to America to have a better life. It's a backlash against people who aren't white and will be voted into existence by the people who are white.

It's time for people to stop using the "You live in America now, so speak English" rationale. Only the Native American people can claim their ancestors came from North America. It's time to remember we were all immigrants at one time.

ADMISSIONS POLICY UNNEEDED

Editor,
Your March 21 issue contained a letter to the editor concerning the open-admissions policy at K-State and the other Kansas Board of Regent schools. As alumni of K-State, we would like to respond to this situation.

Kansas is the only state in the nation to have an open-admission policy to our knowledge. We feel this policy is necessary to meet the needs of all Kansas high school graduates. We feel all high school students should have a chance to go to a Kansas Board of Regents school if they so desire.

Once at the university, it is the professors', instructors' and students' responsibility to work together to fulfill the educational requirements as set by the regents. If a student is having difficulty with the course work, she or he should contact the professor or instructor for additional help. Professors and instructors also need to recognize when a student is having trouble and be willing to help the student out.

It seems to us that many of the professors and instructors are at the University to make the big bucks only and not to help the students. If they are more willing to help the students, we would see a much better success rate of all students attending the university. By making the professors and instructors spend more time with the students and less time worrying about themselves and their pet projects, all high school graduates who so desired could receive the education at one of the regent schools without having to worry about test scores, high school ranks or rank in their graduating class.

The restricted-admissions policy will allow only students with high GPAs to go to a major university. The students with lower GPAs are left to fend for themselves to get any higher education that might not be on the same par as a major university.

Everything starts as theory, not as a fact

Einstein was an incredible man with scientific theories that changed the way we view our world and how it works. I will never be a great scientist, but I have a few theories of my own. I am sure you do, too. Probably more than you know.

Most of what we do everyday is based on theories gained through careful experimentation, analyzing results and responding accordingly.

Theories are personal, sometimes unexpected things. I know perfectly sane people who believe in the Abominable Snowman. They can show you pictures and tell you case histories backing up their claim. My mother swears if she has Christian music on the radio in her car that she will find a great parking space.

Reputations are theories. People are desirable because you believe they are smart or sexy. A bar is cool because people theorize they will have a good time or will be able to pick up a date there. People and places gain their reputations on these theories. Whether these impressions are true does not matter — it is how widely held the belief is.

People who see conspiracy in everything can always find good evidence to back up their theories. The difference is when analyzing the data they come to their own little twisted conclusions.

You might have a lucky pencil used to take exams. Your theory is that specific pencil enhances your performance. I know someone who sprinkles glittery "angel dust" on her exams.

Sport figures have unusual rituals and superstitions. Whatever a ball player is doing when a streak begins, no matter how strange, must be continued. Whether he hasn't had sex in weeks, has his bat touched in a voodoo ritual or wears women's underwear, these routines become the key to success.

Religion is all theory. That does not mean it is not true. It just means you can't prove it. I really think God does things that way on purpose. It takes faith to believe in a theory.

Everything we know was once a theory. After a while if a majority of people believe something, it moves from theory to fact.

Just because a theory becomes a fact doesn't make it a truth. The world used to be flat. The sun used to revolve around the Earth. Communism used to be the true evil. Michael Jackson used to be cool.

I have some unique theories of my own. No one else has to believe them, and no amount of evidence will sway my convictions. One example of my peculiar theories is the Bible.

The Bible is a good book. My theory is the Bible evolved in close to the same way you played the game "telephone" as a child. A story starts with one person, but by the time it gets to the last person, it has changed a bit.

Have you seen the Pizza Hut commercial? The one where the guys are talking about a football game? For me, the Bible is more like this commercial than it is the truth etched in stone.

In the commercial, the guys start out playing a small, hometown high school football game on a beautiful day with a fairly mundane ending. When the story is retold for the millionth time 20 years later, it becomes a major game before a roaring crowd in a blizzard, and the kicker made a fantastic field goal in a full-body cast to win the championship.

Some of the Bible stories seem a little like that. Moses probably did lead the people out of Egypt through the Red Sea, just during low tide.

I know it seems sacrilegious to equate the Bible and Pizza Hut, but theories are not always politically correct. Your personal beliefs don't have to be socially acceptable. Remember, we don't always have to act on our theories or expect anyone else to believe them. You never know, the world might in fact be flat.

Mary Renee Smith is a freshman in journalism and mass communications.

Now, if I were God watched "Prophecy" the other night, a cool movie starring Christopher Walkin and Eric Stoltz as the archangels Gabriel and Michael, respectively.

In "Prophecy," Gabriel is the bad guy, but only because God won't talk to him anymore.

It got me thinking about what kind of crazy God would set up a system in which his right-hand men (Lucifer, then Gabriel) revolted every 1,000 years.

Normally, I don't spend a lot of time thinking about Christian stuff. A long time ago I determined (to my own satisfaction) that Christianity is a load of hokey.

It keeps cropping up, though. This is one heckuva Christian town, in one heckuva Christian state, in one heckuva Christian nation. Besides, cool movies like "Prophecy" keep coming out that have Judeo-Christian mythology as their basic premise.

So, I found myself thinking about what kind of God would set up this kind of world, let alone the spooky kind of world described in "Prophecy."

And, as I am arrogantly bound to do, I came up with a few things I would do different if I were God.

Here's just a sample:
If I were God, I would make it a lot easier to grow food. I would make the ground so fertile that you would just have to look at it funny and pow there would be enough to feed you for a year.

Also, I would come up with some more variety in the kinds of crops available. Maybe hamburger trees, so a) McDonalds would never exist, and b) even vegetarians could enjoy a fine burger now and then.

If I were God, I would also arrange to talk to everyone. Forget communicating through prayer and Bibles and stuff. I would visit everyone, whenever they called, or at least every year on their birthday. I could do it, too, because I would be God.

That would solve a lot of religious disputes right away. I think. The Judeo-Christian God has been like the ultimate absentee parent. I would stick around and instill some real family values.

If I were God, everyone would know who I was and what I wanted. No one would fight over me.

I would set up some new commandments. I would keep the one about killing, and maybe a couple of the others, but I would ditch the adultery one. There would be no need for marriage because there would be no need for the nuclear family — I would be everybody's dad.

I would cure cancer, AIDS and warts. I would make sure everybody had a nice computer. I would make every day the weekend, and every bar would serve the nectar of the gods.

But heck, I would be omnipotent, so I might as well shoot for the whole shebang. I would give everybody a free pass to heaven, let them come and go as they please. Everybody's happy in heaven, or so I was told in Sunday school, so every body would be happy whenever wanted to be.

If there were still evil people, I would change them. I would be God and could do anything, including changing evil people into good people with a snap of my holy fingers.

Some readers might be thinking, "Thank God Jason isn't God." Others may be livid with rage at my blasphemy.

But really, I am not writing this simply to bait Christians. I honestly want believers in an all-powerful God to think about why exactly the world contains evil and sin and meatloaf.

This is an omnipotent creator we are talking about here. He is responsible for all the cool stuff in the world (and there is a lot of that), but all the really bad stuff, too.

If the Judeo-Christian God did create the world, evil and sin and meatloaf all exist because he created them, or because he allowed them to come into being. Either way, it does not reflect well on the deity.

One friend of mine shook her head sadly when I told her all this, and said, "That is what faith is all about, Jason. Believing when you have absolutely no reason to believe."

Ah. It is all so clear now, I thought. Faith is stupid.

If God exists, we might never know his ineffable wisdom. That is the thing about ineffability. You just can't eff it.

But, if God does exist, he will just have to understand that I think he is a lousy creator. After all, he gave a brain that questions him and no real answers. If he is responsible, he has got some explaining to do.

Marquette defeats Cats in tourney

Shana Newell
sports editor

For some K-State students, March Madness didn't end with the K-State loss to New Mexico in the first round of the NCAA Tournament.

For Karlton Place, senior in civil engineering; Andy Wingert, senior in history; Shane Kaberline, senior in kinesiology; Corby Kassebaum, senior in biochemistry, and Allen Poppe, senior in biochemistry, spring break included a trip to the Sweet 16 of the Pizza Hut Hoops 3-on-3 Road Trip Invitational.

Having defeated New Mexico's and Georgetown's 3-on-3 teams in the first and second rounds in Richmond, Va., the Wildcat squad traveled to Atlanta to take on the New Orleans team.

Round one was fairly easy for the Cats as Kassebaum led K-State to a 16-13 victory over New Orleans.

"We jumped out to a 5-0 lead," Wingert said. "We let them crawl back into it, but Corby (Kassebaum) stepped up. He couldn't miss. He was en fuego."

Although the Cats pulled out the win over the Privateers, K-State fell to Marquette in the Elite Eight round, 16-14.

"It was bad. We were up 6-0, then 10-4, then 12-6, and we blew it," Wingert said.

From there, the Golden Eagles held the Cats to one point while going on a 10-point run to end the Cats' bid for a Final Four appearance.

"They had a bunch of shooters that were pretty good," Wingert said. "Marquette was a three-point shooting team, and three-point shots were worth two. They weren't hitting early, but then they stepped up."

"We let them inch back into it. One of their guys hit three three's. He just buried us," he said. "Of their 16 points, 14 of them were from behind the three-point line. They were just a bunch of shooters."

Poppe said the team was disappointed at the loss because it expected to make it to the Final Four.

"We were really disappointed. It's kind of devastating to know that we had it but that we just kind of flipped it out of our hands," he said.

"We thought we were there," he said. "That made it worse. It's worse when you can taste it, and then it gets taken from you."

Wingert said although the team was disappointed, everyone had fun.

And of course, K-State benefited from the team's performance.

With the Cats' Elite Eight appearance, Pizza Hut will donate $5,000 to K-State's general student scholarship fund.

Cats split matches with BYU, Utah

Shane McCormick
contributing writer

There was no spring break for the K-State women's tennis team last week. The week provided its share of ups and downs for the Wildcats.

The Cats started off the break taking to the courts against a couple of Western Athletic Conference teams in Brigham Young University and Utah.

The first dual for the Cats came against the ninth-ranked Cougars of BYU. K-State dropped the match 5-2. One of the wins for the Cats came with the singles play of senior Karina Kuregian at the No. 2 spot.

Kuregian continued her successful spring campaign with a convincing 6-3, 6-1 win against Jennifer Saret. With the victory, Kuregian improved her spring record to a perfect 5-0.

Coach Steve Bietau said Kuregian's ability to not allow Saret back into the match was the key.

"I felt that after the first set, Saret had a chance to loosen up and put up more of a challenge," he said. "But Karina was able to close the match out quickly."

Also picking up a win was sophomore Dinah Watson, who was playing her third match of the season. Watson, who has been battling shoulder problems, gathered an impressive 6-0, 6-3 victory against Michelle Domanico.

After breaking into the ITA rankings, sophomore Yana Dorodnova lost her first match of the season. Dorodnova fell to Elaine Chiew, ranked No. 63 in the nation, 6-1, 6-3 in No. 1 singles. It was Dorodnova's first loss in seven matches.

Bietau said Chiew's defensive play was what gave Dorodnova trouble.

"She's the first player this year that Yana has applied pressure to that was able to respond and play her game," he said.

The Cougars closed out the dual by taking all three doubles matches from the Cats.

The next day the Cats were able to recover from the loss to BYU with a decisive 6-1 victory against

Weather dampens Cats' spring break

Shana Newell
sports editor

Sooner or later, Mother Nature will have to cooperate.

Or so the K-State baseball team would hope.

The Wildcats began the spring break expecting to play eight games.

But thanks to Mother Nature, they only played five, canceling home contests against the University of Illinois-Chicago and Iowa State and an away match-up with Oklahoma.

"The weather has really hurt us," Coach Mike Clark said.

"Baseball is a game that needs to be played, and it needs to be played often to keep your timing. We are really struggling with our rhythm right now because we are playing for three days, then sitting for three days.

"We need to play to get some continuity."

K-State's sluggers started the week with a two-game sweep of Illinois-Chicago. The Cats extinguished the Flames 3-2 and 8-6 to improve their record to 16-7. Game three was canceled because of cold weather.

The Cats then traveled to Norman, Okla., for a two-game series against the No. 24 Sooners.

In the first game, Oklahoma escaped a loss by a Wildcat comeback in a 13-12 victory for the Sooners. Senior Matt Koeman earned the loss for the Cats.

K-State led 6-2 going into the fourth inning, but a seven-run rally by the Sooners forced Brian Thompson onto the mound to relieve Koeman.

The Sooners posted four more runs in the fifth and sixth innings to give Oklahoma a 13-8 run heading into the eighth.

K-State began to rally in the seventh on a solo home run by center fielder Adam Green with two outs on the board. It was Green's second career home run.

The Cats were unable to post more runs in the seventh but clawed back in the eighth to keep hope alive.

Singles by left fielder Frank Gappa and catcher Paul Cranford and a walk to center fielder Adam Green with two outs brought shortstop Heath Schesser to the plate. Schesser singled, scoring Gappa. Second baseman Scott Poepard knocked in two runs on a single.

After third baseman Todd Fereday walked, designated hitter David Hendrix was struck out looking by the Oklahoma hurler.

Unable to put up any runs in the ninth, K-State fell to 1-2 in conference play.

Game two of the series was canceled due to rain and will not be made up due to conference regulations.

K-State returned to Frank Myers Field for a three-game series against cellar-dwellers Iowa State to close out the spring break weekend but was only able to play two games due to rain.

The Cats split Sunday's doubleheader with an 11-7 victory and a 7-6 loss.

"We've lost three conference games so far this season, and all three have been one-run games," Clark said.

"I think that says a lot about the team. Really, we were three runs away from being 5-0 in the conference. We need to stay positive."

Clark said one of K-State's problems is control of the game.

"We've kind of let them (the opponent) dictate the game," he said.

"Then we've had to battle back to keep in the game. We need to go out and control it from the first inning on."

Heading into a doubleheader with Wichita State on Tuesday, Clark said he hopes the losses were a warning for the players.

"I think it was a wake-up call for them," he said.

"But we're going to put a streak together. We're going to be a good ballclub."

The Cats improved their record to 17-9 overall and 2-3 in the Big Eight.

The squad returns to Frank Myers Field at 7 p.m. Friday for a three-game weekend series with the Missouri Tigers.

Baseball is a game that needs to be played often to keep your timing. We are really struggling with our rhythm right now because we are playing for three days, then sitting for three days. We need to get some continuity.

Wildcat women dominate Baylor Bear Invitational

Shana Newell

The K-State track teams were in Texas during the spring break, but they weren't relaxing on any beaches.

While there, the women's team won the Baylor Bear Invitational, defeating squads from Baylor, Texas A & M and Southwest Texas.

The women's team was led by Vanitta Kinard, Staci Lowe, Irma Betancourt, Samantha McNamara, Wanita Dykstra and Renetta Seiler.

Kinard placed first in the women's triple jump with a mark of 41'10", good enough for a NCAA provisional bid.

Kinard also came in seventh in the 100-meter hurdles and third in the long jump.

Lowe took first in the javelin throw with a mark of 157'2", also a NCAA provisional mark. The Cats' women dominated the javelin event as Kristen Schultz and Anna Whitham took second and fourth, respectively.

Betancourt took first in the women's 1500- and 800-meter races with times of 4:37.31 and 2:15.15, respectively.

McNamara claimed first place for the Cats in the 5,000-meter race with a time of 18:07.14, while Dykstra took first in the high jump with a height of 5'9 1/4."

Dykstra's mark was also enough to qualify her provisionally for the NCAA Tournament.

Seiler, with a throw of 161'10", provisionally qualified for the NCAA Tournament in the discus event as she took first place in the invitational.

The men's team placed third overall, falling to Texas A & M and Baylor. It was led by Scott Galas, Ryan Clive-Smith, Gene Petersen, Chris May and David Dominguez.

In the 800-meter race, Galas took first with a time of 1:53.53, while Clive-Smith earned third-place honors in the 5,000-meter race.

May claimed a first-place finish in the 1,500-meter race with a time of 3:56.29.

Petersen brought home first place in the shot put with a throw of 56'3 3/4".

In the 3,000-meter steeplechase, David Dominguez placed first with a time of 9:32.3.

The track teams next take to the field on April 13 in Wichita for the Sunflower Classic.

Royals, Orioles go to battle

BALTIMORE — Underneath that rather ordinary physique and behind that seemingly indifferent smirk lurks a pitcher whose unmatched success can be attributed more to his brain than his talented right arm.

There are bigger, stronger pitchers than Mike Mussina. But no one in the game today has a better career winning percentage than the ace of the Baltimore Orioles' staff.

Mussina, 27, brings a 26-inning shutout streak and a 71-30 record into Monday's season opener against the Kansas City Royals. His .703 winning percentage is best among active pitchers, 53 points higher than runner-up Roger Clemens.

Clemens relies heavily on power. Mussina, conversely, is more of a cerebral pitcher.

At 6-foot-1, 180 pounds, Mussina looks more like a guy with an economics degree than a major-league pitcher. Actually, he's both.

His college education didn't get him his current job, although his intellect is the main factor in his uncanny success rate. Mussina has read hundreds of books in his lifetime, but he doesn't keep a book on opposing batters, mainly because he doesn't have to.

"The best part about intelligence is the fact that I can catch on as to what's going on," he said. "I don't chart any

Season opener lasts 12 innings; Seattle slips past White Sox, 3-2

SEATTLE — The earliest start ever in baseball history ended with another late-inning win by the Seattle Mariners.

Alex Rodriguez singled home the winning run with one out in the 12th inning Sunday night, lifting the Mariners over the Chicago White Sox 3-2 in the first major league game played in March.

Randy Johnson struck out 14 in seven innings — part of a team record-tying 21 strikeouts by Seattle pitchers — and Frank Thomas hit a two-run homer for the White Sox.

The Mariners, whose 43 comeback wins last year were part of the reason the 1995 AL West championship banner was raised in pregame ceremonies, did it again.

They scored the tying run in the ninth on an RBI double by AL batting champion Edgar Martinez, and only a lucky bounce for the White Sox prevented Seattle from winning then.

Edwin Hurtado, the fifth Seattle pitcher, was the winner. Simas, a rookie, was Chicago's seventh pitcher.

The Mariners-White Sox game lasted 4 hours, 7 minutes. By the time it ended, it was already April back in Chicago.

Baseball, hoping to recover from an average attendance drop of 20 percent last year, unveiled its new "What A Game" ad campaign on the outfield fence.

Also making a colorful debut were new red shirts that AL umpires will wear at times this year. Not seen, however, were any of the new, below-the-kneecap strikes that baseball wants called this season to speed games.

NCAA FINAL FOUR

No. 1 Kentucky, No. 5 Syracuse to clash for bragging rights

Associated Press

NEW YORK — Rick Pitino likes to preach to his Kentucky basketball team about living in the "precious present." No looking ahead or back. Just worry about today.

Well, almost no looking back.

When Kentucky faces Syracuse in the NCAA championship game Monday night as a 14-point favorite, its toughest job will be solving the Orangemen's 2-3 zone. The zone has been a much-discussed topic among the Wildcats ever since it was used by North Carolina to beat them in last year's Southeast Regional final.

"The North Carolina loss is the only thing we look back on from the past," Kentucky point guard Anthony Epps said Sunday. "We go against that zone every day in practice."

After a season in which it didn't really seem to matter what defense was used against them, the Wildcats (33-2) will finally get to go against the zone in a game. They won by an average of 23 points this season, and Saturday night's 81-74 semifinal victory over top-ranked Massachusetts was their first NCAA Tournament win by fewer than 20 points.

Still, last season's 74-61 loss to North Carolina one step from the Final Four has been a tough one to forget. The Wildcats shot just 28 percent and were 7-for-36 from three-point range.

"After last year when we played North Carolina, we have played against a 2-3 zone for anywhere from 15 to 30 minutes every day," Pitino said. "We've been good at attacking it, and we have to be, because Syracuse plays the best 2-3 zone in the country."

Syracuse (29-8), which reached the title game with a 77-69 victory over Mississippi State, has won praise — not ridicule — for the zone, especially during its improbable NCAA Tournament run. The defense received the credit for the regional final win over Kansas when the Jayhawks became the fourth straight team to shot under 39 percent and were 4-for-25 from beyond the arc.

The zone was shaping up to be the wrong way to go early in Saturday night's game when Mississippi State hit three 3s in as many attempts in the opening four minutes. But the rest of the way, the Orangemen's zone forced the Bulldogs into turnovers and negated their inside game.

Kentucky doesn't want to make the same mistake.

"You have to keep attacking the zone," Pitino said. "You can't rely on fool's gold if you make three or four long jump shots and you think you've discovered a way to beat it. Patience, dribble penetration and offensive rebounding are what's needed to beat a great defense like that."

Syracuse coach Jim Boeheim, who went to the zone because of his team's lack of depth and speed, knows what his team is up against in Kentucky, the preseason No. 1 and a team that was considered the favorite to win it all season.

"They have tremendous depth and are good at every position, and they are able to inside-outside at every position. That's why they've been the way they've been all year," said Boeheim, who hired Pitino as an assistant in his first season at Syracuse.

"They present a lot of problems, and we have to come up with some solutions."

Just like Kentucky has to solve that zone.

"The way we play, we encourage people to take three-point shots," Boeheim said. "But it's not just shooting. It's how you attack it. We have to be prepared for that and adjust to whatever they do."

Whatever Kentucky does, it will be with a lot of players. Pitino uses a 10-man rotation to keep the pressure defense intense and fresh. Syracuse plays seven players, and the starters log most of the minutes. That makes point guard Lazarus Sims the key man in the Orangemen's offense.

When Kentucky beat Syracuse 77-71 last season, the Wildcats were able to force 33 turnovers and rattle point guard Michael Lloyd, who has since left the program.

"No offense intended to the young man, but they had a two-guard playing as a point guard that game," Pitino said. "Now they have Sims."

Sims has 274 assists and 116 turnovers, and his numbers against Mississippi State were 11 points, nine assists and no turnovers. The Orangemen finished with just five turnovers.

"If they turn it over five times against us, it will be a nice runner-up trophy we receive," Pitino said.

the 41st-ranked Utah Utes.

The Cats came out swinging, taking five of the six matchups to clinch the win against the Utes. One of the biggest wins for the Cats came at No. 2 singles, where Dorodnova rebounded from her first loss the day before.

Dorodnova fought hard to take a three-set victory from No. 25 Linda Engblom, 4-6, 6-1, 6-1.

Bietau said he was pleased to see Dorodnova come back from her previous loss.

"She responded well after her loss to BYU," he said. "She got into trouble in the first set but adapted her game and came back to win convincingly in the second and third sets."

Another big win for the Cats came at No. 1 singles, where Kuregian defeated No. 43 Mirja Wallmark.

After dropping the first set 2-6, Kuregian was able to come back and take the second set 6-4. In the decisive third set, Kuregian put Wallmark away 6-2.

In another three-set match, junior Nikki Lagerstrom defeated Molly Sanderson. Lagerstrom won the first set 6-4 but dropped the second 1-6. Lagerstrom was able to take the third set 6-2.

"I am really happy with the way the team fought today. We won every three-set match today," Bietau said.

After the dual in the singles action, the doubles play was a mere formality, but the Cats still took two out of three of the matches.

At No. 1 doubles, Kuregian and sophomore Lena Pilipchak served up a 8-3 win against Wallmark and Rebecca Foulger. Dorodnova and sophomore Dinah Watson teamed up to win the doubles point for the Cats.

Bietau said the victory against the Utes was a big one for the team.

"This was a very important match," he said. "Utah is a regional opponent, so this had NCAA implications."

With the victory, the Cats improved their spring record to 4-4.

thing. Most of it's what I remember from game to game, and building on that."

For instance, during a recent exhibition game against Minnesota, Mussina added yet another chapter in his mental book on Twins second baseman Chuck Knoblauch.

"I remember pitching to him the very first year I got here," said Mussina, referring to a 1991 matchup. "I threw him a couple of nasty breaking balls, and he got two nasty hits. So you adjust, and he adjusts. It's a constant game."

The game gets more difficult when Mussina finds he doesn't have his best stuff. Surprisingly, it happens quite often.

"There are going to be games when your pitches are not going 90, 91 mph, or days when your breaking ball just isn't working. You still have to get guys out," he said. "If I pitch 35 times a year, I would say there are 12 to 15 times a year when I really have to find a way to do something else to win."

For Mussina, it's all mind over matter.

"I'm a battler. I have to be," he said. "I'm not Randy Johnson, a guy who just rears back and says come and get it."

Regardless, Mussina's 19 wins was tops in the AL last season. He's led the Orioles in victories in each of the last four years, the first Baltimore player to do that since Jim Palmer from 1975-78 and the only one to do it in his first four full seasons with the team.

He doesn't have enough decisions yet, but Mussina is on course to break Whitey Ford's major-league record for winning percentage by a pitcher with at least 200 decisions — 690.

The three-time All-Star is the Orioles' player representative and one of few players on the team with a college degree. He'll joke around to a certain extent, but usually leaves the clubhouse hilarity to guys like Roger McDowell and Bill Ripken.

"No doubt he's very intelligent, and that's one of the reasons he's so good," teammate Mike Devereaux said. "He's not a joker or a kidder, but he's sarcastic all the time — in a good way."

Mussina isn't aloof, but his teammates know he won't be the one to light the match on a well-planned hot-foot.

"I don't try to be McDowell or Billy. That's not me," he said. "If I did try to be that way, I'd make myself look unintelligent by trying to be somebody that I wasn't. Some guys are characters, and some guys aren't."

REVIEW

Release spiced with intimate tracks, polished musicians

Fatima Johnson
 contributing writer

Once again, Fourplay has concocted a steaming tray of appetizers in "Elixir," the band's third release. The tracks are intimate, smooth and spiced with tenderness and humor.

The band's first and second albums were certified gold and made it to the top of Billboard's contemporary jazz chart.

The tradition has carried on to "Elixir," which was the band's second nomination for a Grammy award.

The band, which some have dubbed the most successful band in contemporary jazz, seems unable to produce anything short of outstanding. Although this album does not reach that elite status of "favorite," it is a good, solid collection of work.

Taking advantage of each artist's talents, "Elixir" contains two pieces written by each member of the band. The title piece is a collaborative effort.

Fourplay possesses somewhat of a dream team line-up, boasting some of the most highly regarded contemporary jazz musicians.

They take active roles in composing, arranging and producing material.

Keyboardist/pianist Bob James is in the fourth decade of a career dotted with Grammys and gold and platinum records.

He has collaborated with such artists as Earl Klugh, David Sanborn and George Benson.

With 25 solo albums to his credit, guitarist Lee Ritenour has earned a reputation for his versatility in style.

He has worked with artists from Steely Dan to Pink Floyd. A collaborative effort with guitarist Larry Carlton stood alongside "Elixir" on this year's 1996 Grammy list.

Nathan East, one of the world's most respected bass players, recorded and toured with Eric Clapton for several years and performed on Clapton's multi-platinum "Unplugged." East has recently been touring with pop artist Phil Collins.

Drummer Harvey Mason has released six solo albums and earned a number of Grammy nominations. He has scored music for several motion pictures, including "The Color Purple."

"Licorice," a piece written by James, is typical of his style. A bright and upbeat tune, it is a sweet addition to the album.

Ritenour's "Magic Carpet Ride" is another rollicky joy-ride — definitely not a sleeper tune. It is a slick, finger-snapping bit of fun.

Another Ritenour tune, "Play Lady Play," actually contains samples from an old James piece called "Westchester Lady." This, also, is an up-tempo piece and one of the highlights of "Elixir." Fourplay seems to have better success with its more lively tunes.

Because of "Elixir's" nearly predictable sound, the album does not glow on the pinnacle of all-time best works.

However, with this album, the band has established itself as a dependable group with a talent for creating superb jazz.

The quality of musicianship is nearly unparalleled.

► IOWA STATE UNIVERSITY

ISU beer sales to discontinue

■ Criticism results in sales restriction at football stadium

Shuva Rahim
The Iowa State Daily

(U-WIRE) Iowa State football fans who enjoy drinking beer in Cyclone Stadium during games are being cut off.

John Anderson, associate director of university relations at Iowa State, said the university will stop selling beer because of criticism implying the university was promoting drinking.

"It's being discontinued because of a broad review of the practice," he said. "There was enough (criticism) that it was a factor. There were many people who supported (the decision), and there was enough sensitivity out there that it did become a factor in our decision."

However, major athletic donors, who include private individuals or corporations, would be allowed to drink, provided they bring their own alcohol.

These donors take up four of the five suites in the stadium. The fifth suite, used by ISU athletic director Gene Smith, also will not serve alcohol.

Anderson said the stadium started selling alcohol last fall as an experiment. He said the loss of alcohol sales would not be a large financial loss to the athletic department.

"It really isn't that lucrative of a financial venture," he said. "It may reduce the proceeds somewhat because there was some money made on the beer sales, but it wouldn't be that detrimental. There are other ways we could achieve our goal of building a festive atmosphere on game day."

One way this goal is achieved is from a program called Cydlines, a food court idea that started last year, Anderson said. Cydlines, which gives a portion of its proceeds to the athletic department, is operated by a local vendor selected by a bid to sell food and refreshments two hours before a game. It is on the west side of the stadium in a fenced-off area. Next year, the yet-to-be-selected vendor will not be able to sell alcohol.

University stadiums that don't serve alcoholic beverages are not uncommon. The University of Iowa's Kinnick Stadium and the University of Northern Iowa's UNI-Dome also do not sell beer, according to officials there.

UNI's athletic donors can have alcohol in their suites. U of I officials were not available to comment on its stadium alcohol policy. Concerts at ISU's stadium might not necessarily give in to the new rule, Anderson said. "This is strictly for football games and Cydlines."

► NATIONAL GEOGRAPHIC BEE

8th-grader takes title

■ Geography contest tests knowledge of 4-8th grade students

Laurel Howell
staff reporter

Manhattan eighth-grader James Un was the winner of the state-level competition for the National Geographic Bee March 29.

"I think it's important for students to know (geography)," Un said.

Un said it wasn't what he learned in school that helped him win, but how he prepared for the bee by watching the news and reading the newspaper.

The state-level competition took place in the K-State Union Friday afternoon.

The oral contest tested 100 fourth-through eighth-grade students' geographic knowledge.

The questions covered a range of topics related to geography, including history, politics and culture. Ben Smith, associate professor of elementary education, said.

The state bee is the second level of the National Geographic Bee, which began in December when thousands of Kansas students took a written exam.

The students with the top 100 scores on the exam advanced to the state level competition, said Kevin Page, coordinator of the state-level competition and assistant professor of geography.

Un, along with the first-place winner from each state, the Department of Defense schools and five U.S. territories received $100 and other prizes, along with an all-expense-paid trip to Washington, D.C., for the national finals May 28-29, Smith said.

The National Geographic Society developed the National Geographic Bee in 1989 in response to concern about the lack of geographic knowledge among young people, he said.

The student representing Kansas won the national level competition in 1989, the first year the competition took place, Smith said.

The National Geographic Bee finals are scheduled to air on TBS at 7 p.m. May 29.

Other finalists include D.J. Johnson of Overland Park, finishing in second place, and Leigh Fine of Emporia, finishing in third place.

nity members and K-State volunteers, have put hundreds of work hours into the home since the ground breaking last September.

Each adult living in a HFHI home is required to complete 200 sweat-equity hours, and each youth 10-15 years old must complete at least 10 volunteer hours.

"You have to do 'X' amount of equity hours in community service," Siders said.

Siders said community service could include helping the Flint Hills Breadbasket, among other areas of service.

"I chose to help build my house," she said. "I learned a lot."

The Siders put in their sweat-equity and community hours and went way beyond the required amount, Thomas said.

"It was wonderful," she said. "I finally said, 'I'm not going to keep track of your hours anymore.'"

Siders has taken three days off from work to move into her new home.

"We're going to spend the night tonight," Siders said. "We have pillows and blankets in the car."

And Vanessa said she has plans for her new room.

"I will finally have my own room," Vanessa said. "I'm going to decorate it with roses."

CATEGORIES

To help you find what you are looking for, the classified ads have been arranged by category and sub-category. All categories are marked by one of the large images, and sub-categories are preceded by a number designation.

TIPS FOR WRITING A CLASSIFIED AD

Always put what item or service you are advertising first. This helps potential buyers find what they are looking for.

Don't use abbreviations. Many buyers are confused by abbreviations.

Consider including the price. This tells buyers if they are looking at something in their price range.

WE DO NOT USE PHONE NUMBERS OR LAST NAMES IN PERSONALS.

Fitness Facts Many exercisers are looking for the perfect workout. Some will turn to the pages of their favorite fitness magazine for the answers. While these workouts might be beneficial for some people, they may not produce the desired results for others. The reason for this is that everyone is unique. Experience and experimentation will help to determine the perfect workout for you.

Nutrition Notes Smaller, more frequent meals result in better weight control. The reason for this is that smaller meals will deposit less fat than one or two larger meals. The body is only able to use a certain number of calories at a given time. Any excess calories will be stored as fat. Instead of 2-3 large meals, try 4-6 smaller meals to keep your metabolism up throughout the day.

Rec Report

Who's Who at Rec Services

Ron Dubbert is a senior in agribusiness and has dedicated four years to intramural sports. Ron worked the first two years as an official and the remaining two years as an intramural supervisor. "I love working intramurals," Ron said. "Not only do I love being around sports, but I really like the participants and the people I work with." When not working, Ron enjoys playing basketball, golf and hunting pheasant. Following graduation this May, Ron plans to work as a crop production specialist.

Keith Sides is a familiar face to intramurals. Keith has worked intramurals for four years, two as an official and two as an intramural supervisor. "This has got to be one of the best jobs around," Keith said. "I get paid to be around the two things I love, sports and competition." When not working or studying, Keith enjoys playing golf and basketball. After he graduates this May, Keith plans to teach and also coach basketball and football.

YOU ASKED IT.

Question

Lots of gyms and recreation centers are installing indoor climbing walls. Why can't we get one for all the climbers? Even an outdoor wall would be useful.

Rec Response

A climbing wall was not in the plans for the expansion. That is not to say we would not consider it in the future. Thanks for asking.

Candidates take role seriously

■ Despite appearances, students want to win election

Scott M. Ladd
staff reporter

As Democracy sniffed around the floor, one student body presidential candidate pulled back his jacket to reveal a six-shooter.

His partner extended his left hand to shake hands. A hook replacing his right hand prevented him from the traditional handshake.

The one with fake sideburns and six-shooter tells his dog, Democracy, to calm down.

Despite their appearances and pseudonyms, Joshua Baze, junior in advertising, and his running mate, Colin Rafferty, junior in secondary education, assure they are real candidates.

"We're the real deal," said Rafferty, who will appear on the ballot as Ezekiel McCracken. "The other candidates are not taking us seriously. You should never underestimate your opponent."

Baze, the presidential candidate who will appear on the ballot as Hiram H. Horsefeathers, explained the alter egos.

"At the first meeting, we felt unwelcomed," Baze said. "It is very apparent everybody needs to lighten up a little bit. We also thought that surely suits and six-shooters would command some respect."

Baze also points out that students should think about the message the candidates bring.

College Council connects students, faculty, administration

■ Council members to be selected during Student Senate elections

Bill Bontempo
staff writer

The College Council is a campus political organization that seeks to help students by providing representation and leadership to their respective colleges.

This year is the first time College Council members will be elected during Student Senate elections.

"The councils serve as a link between students and the faculty and the administrators in their college," Aaron Truax, College Council coordinator, said.

Nine colleges at the University have council representatives, who organize activities, allocate Student Senate funds to groups in their colleges and appoint replacements for Senate vacancies.

Councils also evaluate Senate constitutional revisions and deal with issues not addressed by Senate.

Chrissy Claypool, vice president of college council for the College of Business and Administration, said one of the main goals of her council this semester is to plan and organize the college's open house.

Councils can also have a more direct impact on students' concerns.

Last semester, the College of Engineering was considering the construction of a library addition to Durland Hall, and some students in the school were concerned about a proposal to use the engineering college fee to furnish the addition.

Darren Bonawitz, vice president of the Engineering council, said an overwhelming majority of engineering students supported the proposal, and the council ensured students were informed of the situation.

Bonawitz said the effect of the council in this situation will be felt well into the future, because the library addition is moving into the planning stages.

"It's going to benefit and affect thousands of students in the upcoming years," he said.

Bonawitz said he is also pleased with a non-political effect his council has had. "Something we're very proud of is new student orientation seminars," he said.

The council started the program to help incoming engineering students deal with frequent problems and answer common questions.

He said the seminars have been a big success and his council hopes to help the councils of other colleges on campus institute similar programs.

Virginia Moxley, adviser to the council for the College of Human Ecology, said her college's council allocates Student Senate funds to groups such as Student Dietetics Association and the American Society of Interior Designers.

Moxley said the council also serves an important role in the relationship with Student Senate and the students in the college.

"It's probably the chief way that senators get information about what students in the College of Human Ecology think about legislation," she said.

Rural firefighters try to put out a grass fire at Top of the World that they said was intentionally started Monday afternoon. Three houses were damaged in the fire Monday on Mariatt Avenue, officials said. The fire quickly spread up the hill at Top of the World north of Manhattan and burned 10 to 15 acres of land, causing about $5,000 worth of damage to the houses, Rural Fire Chief Pat Collins said. "It didn't burn much land, but it was definitely serious, because there were people in the houses," he said.

Forensics team shoots for Final 4 in tournament

Darren Whitley
staff reporter

K-State's forensics team is hoping to make it to the Final Four of forensics during the national tournament at the University of Florida beginning Friday.

The team will begin the 23-hour drive to Florida this evening.

During the team's Monday meeting, Craig Brown, instructor in speech and director of individual events, used the NCAA basketball championship as a metaphor.

Brown warned members not to give in to the pressures of expectations like Kentucky or the pressures of no expectations like Syracuse.

"Revel in what you have accomplished," Brown said.

He warned them not to walk through the motions of the tournament. Using a metaphor from the opening day of baseball, Brown said they should not give easy outs.

Jared Adams, senior in speech, is expected to lead the team, because he is the reigning national champion in the communication analysis event.

Adams said the team has a good chance to finish well.

"The district we compete in is traditionally the toughest district during the regular season. If you can compete in this district and do well, it is likely you will do well at nationals," Adams said.

Brown said the district helps keep the forensics team accountable and from getting sloppy.

"We hit 10 of the top 20 schools in the nation at almost any given tournament," Brown said. "It does take a tremendous amount of work."

Brown said K-State's success is in its work ethic.

"A lot of our people just work harder than other people at other schools," he said. "A good chunk of the people who qualified were here all during spring break working on stuff. It is sort of like what you want to get out of that is the kind of work you put into it."

Three hundred schools compete in 11 events at the tournament. Each student may enter six events. K-State has two students who are entering five events.

Janelle Moore, junior in microbiology, is one of the two who are entering five events. She said because she is not a speech major, she has a different perspective to approach impromptu speeches with.

"When I get up and talk about microbiology, people do not know what it is so I think it is interesting, and I can bring new aspects to it," she said.

The impromptu speech event gives the speaker only seven minutes to prepare and present a speech on a topic.

"The good people prepare about 30 seconds and then deliver a six and a half minute speech. It is a great chance to take what people have learned in other areas in school and life areas and be able to relate them to this," Brown said.

► 2-YEAR-OLD MUSLIM-CROAT FEDERATION CLOSE TO CRUMBLING

SARAJEVO, Bosnia-Herzegovina (AP) — The Muslim-Croat federation, a U.S. brainchild, is in free fall two years after its inception, a victim of nationalist politicians whose power rests on ethnic division.

The Americans and others in the international community are exerting intense pressure on both sides to start working together.

But many fear that once NATO peacekeepers leave Bosnia, the federation — the cornerstone of the Dayton peace agreement — will crumble, plunging the country back into war.

Ironically, the Bosnian Serbs, vilified by most of the international community during the war for starting the conflict, have begun winning praise for honoring commitments under the peace accord.

It is the federation that is causing the most headaches.

► TACO BELL ANNOUNCES APRIL FOOL'S DAY PURCHASE OF LIBERTY BELL

PHILADELPHIA (AP) — A cursory check of the Liberty Bell on Monday found no trace of taco juice on the iron, no Burrito Supremes in the crack.

No, Taco Bell didn't buy the Liberty Bell.

In an April Fools' Day joke, the fast-food chain took out full-page ads in eight newspapers announcing that it had purchased America's symbol of freedom to help shrink the federal debt.

The bell will henceforth be called, the ads said, the Taco Liberty Bell.

By noon — the traditional time for confessions — the company came clean. The bell will remain in its home outside Independence Hall, and the Irvine, Calif., company will donate $50,000 toward preservation and maintenance.

"We would never say we didn't need the money," said Martha B. Aikens, superintendent of Independence National Historical Park. "But the word sale never came up."

Taco Bell refused to say how much it paid for the ads.

Legally, the federal government couldn't sell the Liberty Bell even if wanted to. The city of Philadelphia actually owns the bell.

"We're not about to run for the border," Kevin Feeley, a City Hall spokesman said.

His boss, Mayor Edward G. Rendell, said hoax or not, he would hit up the company for a new Liberty Bell pavilion.

The joke provided several hours of amusement — and amazement — before the truth came out.

► CHINA'S LEADER FEELS PRESSURE

BEIJING (AP) — Chinese President Jiang Zemin was inclined to be accommodating when Taiwan's president did the unthinkable and visited the United States last summer.

Then he heard from the military.

Bombarded by hundreds of letters each day from officers infuriated by his mild stance, Jiang quickly got the message that China must respond strongly to the affront to Chinese sovereignty over the renegade island.

A month later, China's army was firing test missiles into the strait that separates Taiwan from the mainland as a warning to stop efforts to gain the island international recognition.

► FAMILY REMEMBERS STRUGGLE

WANTAGE TOWNSHIP, N.J. (AP) — Julia and Joseph Quinlan remember their daughter as a vibrant tomboy who taught her younger brother to wrestle, a young woman with a beautiful voice who dreamed of being a singer.

Most Americans recall Karen Ann Quinlan as the comatose woman in a black-and-white photograph published around the world, whose life on a ventilator led to the nation's first major right-to-die case.

Twenty years ago Sunday, the New Jersey Supreme Court ruled the Quinlans had the right to take their daughter off life-support equipment. Since then, dozens of court rulings and scores of laws have backed that right.

"They say we were the pioneers. I guess we were. We just did what we had to do," Quinlan, a former pharmaceutical executive, said.

► PEROT: U.S. WANTS 3RD PARTY

NAPLES, Fla. (AP) — Ross Perot was talking in a steamy high school gymnasium in that nasal Texas twang, reciting the history of taxes, the evils of Washington politics and the many changes his Reform Party would make if it got control of the White House.

"The majority wants a third political party," Perot said. "It can be the majority party, no ifs, ands or buts."

But while many in the crowd liked Perot's message Friday, they had lingering doubts about the messenger. They were especially skeptical about his repeated claim that he isn't running for president.

"I think he's insulting our intelligence when he says he's not running as the Reform candidate," complained Claude Carter, a Naples businessman. "Who else could possibly run?"

► DISEASE'S CAUSE STILL A MYSTERY

WASHINGTON (AP) — If there's a word that sums up "mad cow disease" and the similar illness that eats people's brains, it could be "mystery."

There's no test for these diseases, and no treatment. Nobody even knows what causes them — or for sure that 10 people in Britain were truly sickened by eating infected beef.

All those unknowns mean that even though experts believe there's little chance that mad cow disease could spread to this country — or hurt people — they can't rule out the possibility.

"It's a hard thing to explain to people," Agriculture Department veterinarian Linda Detwiler said.

New process may add value to Kansas crops

QUICKread

► A K-State extension specialist is developing a way to preserve eucalyptus branches. It may be applied to native Kansas crops that are used in flower arrangements.

Lynn Wuger
staff reporter

Improving the process of preserving eucalyptus might result in new opportunities for Kansas crops.

Alan Stevens, extension specialist in commercial floriculture and ornamental horticulture, has been working to refine the commercial process used to preserve and color eucalyptus for craft and floral uses.

"What we look to do is take away the perishability factor and start preserving things with a process other than air drying," Stevens said.

"We are using a glycerin solution which helps preserve plants, keeping them soft."

The preservation process involves soaking plant branches in a mixture of glycerin and water adjusted to the proper pH level, along with the addition of a bactericide.

This leaves the branches with a just-picked feel — soft to the touch and flexible instead of dry and brittle as with dried plant materials.

Stevens was approached by eucalyptus processors in California to conduct research for them to improve the process.

"Not all plant branches take to the preservation process," he said.

"The people in California asked me to research developing a way to reduce the waste percentage."

Typically, manufacturers must throw out 15 percent to 20 percent of preserved branches as nonsalable. Stevens' goal is to reduce the waste to 2 percent or less.

"We have made significant changes in the way the process works and have eliminated the amount of waste," he said.

"It was at 15 to 20 percent, and now we have it between 2 percent and 4 percent. We met the initial goal, but we still have room to improve."

Along with improving preservation, Stevens is working on the optimal commercial process to allow for custom coloring.

"We use textile dyes to color the plant material, which is primarily used for decorative plant and floral arrangements and other home decor items," Stevens said.

Barbara Gatewood, professor of textiles, has been assisting Stevens with this facet of the project.

"The dyes that work well on cotton and other natural fibers also work well on plants," he said.

"That is why Barbara is involved since she is a textile chemist and familiar with the dyes."

Gatewood said she answers technical questions and offers her expertise in dying.

"The people in horticulture are knowledgeable when it comes to plants but don't know a lot about dying the plants," she said.

"Alan will come to me seeking advice on dying plants, and I will answer technical questions for him from time to time."

Results of Stevens' eucalyptus research can also be used in Kansas.

"We ended up developing a model process using eucalyptus, and now we are taking the technology we developed and looking to apply it to native Kansas plant materials," he said.

Stevens has been experimenting with the eastern red cedar, an evergreen tree that thrives in Kansas but is considered to be a weed by many agricultural producers.

"We are looking at preserving the tree for use as long-lasting Christmas greens to make wreaths, garlands and other seasonal decorations," he said.

Gatewood said the research is important to Kansas agriculture.

"Value-added agriculture is a big thing among crop growers," she said.

"It's important to add to the value of crops, along with their initial use, and Alan is helping to do that."

The quality of the preserved Kansas plant materials has even captured the eye of Martha Stewart. It was featured on her syndicated television show and in her magazine, Martha Stewart Living.

"It's nice to see Kansas gain recognition as being the source of a quality product and as the source of valuable information," Stevens said.

"It also gives more credibility to Kansas, having developed something that is not your typical agriculture product."

It's nice to see Kansas gain recognition as being the source of a quality product and as the source of valuable information.

Campus Fest to offer fun, prizes

■ Sports Illustrated to bring human bowling, other games to K-State

Kris Bethen
staff reporter

Free games, free prizes, and free samples. What more could a college student returning from spring break ask for?

All this and more will be at the Sports Illustrated Campus Fest from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Wednesday and Thursday in the Union free-speech zone.

"Everything is free," said Brenda Anthony, junior in political science and K-State Union Bookstore employee.

"Basically it is a lot of fun," she said. "A lot of people show up and everyone gets involved. It is very, very interactive."

Sports Illustrated has been bringing its activities to K-State for at least four or five years, Anthony said.

"KQLA-FM 103.5 will have its Wheel of Fortune and be on live remote," Anthony said.

Different departments from the Union donated prizes for the Wheel of Fortune.

Anthony said she encouraged other campus organizations to participate.

Students need to register at either of the white registration booths. Then they are free to try any of the events.

"One activity is human bowling in which one person gets into a big iron ball, then two friends roll the ball at bowling pins," said Joe Stevens, a member of the Fest crew that sets up the booths and activities. "This is in an inflatable bowling alley. You need a strike or spare to win."

Other activities include a basketball shoot-out, a volleyball spike competition, an obstacle course, sumo wrestling and a horizontal bungee run. All events are sponsored by products, and different prizes are provided by the sponsors.

"The main, big sponsor is Sports Illustrated," Anthony said.

Other products sponsor specific games, she said.

"This is just a traveling on-campus promotion," John Fox, another member of the crew, said. "We hit 25 campuses per year — 15 in the fall and 10 in the spring."

Fox has been traveling with the group for two years.

"This is a way for companies to bring products and samples to campuses," he said.

Fox said the group has been here before, and it worked out really well.

"We have a good relationship with the bookstore here," Fox said.

The bookstore helps organize it and prepares everything for it, Anthony said.

"This is my first time coordinating it," Anthony said. "It seems to be going pretty well."

► GUEST LECTURE

U.S.-Soviet relations expert to speak

Rick Druse
staff reporter

Students can listen to a Russian professor who helped Soviet and Russian presidents develop foreign policy toward the United States at 2 p.m. today in Forum Hall.

Georgii Arbatov has been Russia's expert about the United States for the last 28 years, and he plans to speak about United States and Russia relations and the upcoming elections in Russia.

He attended all the summit meetings between the United States and Russia from 1961 to 1991.

"K-State is gaining someone who has an encyclopedic knowledge of how the Russian political decision-making operation works and who probably knows more about the evolution of the U.S.-Soviet/Russian relations than anyone alive today," Dale Herspring, head of the political science department, said.

Arbatov was born in the Ukraine in 1923.

He attended the Institution of International Relations in Moscow, where he earned a degree in international law.

In 1970, he became a corresponding member of the Academy of Sciences of the USSR and was elevated to a full member.

He worked for several Soviet/Russian journals through the 1950s and '60s. He then became the head of the ideological problems section for the Institute of World Economy and Relations in Moscow. He founded the Institute for the Study of the USA and Canada in Moscow.

Arbatov has also written several books about United States-Russia relations and the political system of Russia.

► COMA RAPE

Nurse's aide to take test

Associated Press

ROCHESTER, N.Y. — A fired nurse's aide was ordered Monday to provide a blood sample to help determine if he raped a woman who recently gave birth after 10 years in a coma-like state.

John Horace, 52, worked at a nursing home where the 29-year-old woman was impregnated last August, and two co-workers told investigators they saw him acting suspiciously in her room, prosecutors said at a hearing.

State Supreme Court Judge Charles J. Siragusa gave Horace two days to supply the court with the blood sample. No charges have been filed.

A preliminary DNA test of saliva on an envelope and stamp Horace allegedly licked established a 99.55 percent chance that he is the father, said New York Deputy Attorney General Russell Buscaglia.

The blood sample could determine paternity with odds of up to 1 million to one.

Doctors said they believe it is the first case of someone getting pregnant and having a baby while in a chronic vegetative state. The 2-pound, 11-ounce boy was born two months prematurely March 18, and a DNA sample was taken from the umbilical cord.

In the last two months, Horace has pleaded guilty in two unrelated cases: to posing as a sex therapist and to fondling a 49-year-old multiple sclerosis patient at the nursing home Sept. 12.

He was "fired" two days after that incident.

He faces six-month sentences in each of those pleas.

Nursing staff did not realize until late December that the woman, who suffered brain damage in a December 1985 car crash, was pregnant. Neurologists said it is unlikely she retains any conscious awareness.

Fees most important issue

This year's student government elections are of great importance to the future of K-State.

Different candidates for office with vastly different philosophies and different track records are seeking your vote. We are not seeking these positions to fluff up our résumés. We want to work for you. We would like to take this opportunity to give you some information about our stances on the issues facing students.

The most important of these issues is student fees. With tuition growing at about 3 to 7 percent a year, the cost of an education is skyrocketing. The cost of campus fees can make the difference in a person going to college at all.

If we do not hold the line on campus fees, students might be "fee'd" out of an education.

We want to make K-State accessible to all students. We strongly feel students deserve the right to express their opinions about mandated fees. Students should have the right to vote on all proposed fee increases. This is the students' campus, and they should have a say in the process. Students, not administrators, should make the decision.

However, talk is cheap. Actions speak louder than words. We both voted for a bill in Student Senate that would have allowed K-State students to vote on the Student Health Fee. This bill failed by one vote (24-25).

Students should realize we as senators are accountable to the students. Ask other senators who are running for office if they voted for student input or if they saw fit to deny students this opportunity. When we say something, students can count on us. We are not fair-weather politicians. Remember, actions speak louder than words.

Another important issue regards teacher evaluations. We support efforts to make the results of teacher evaluations public. When people are prohibited from knowing the record, something is wrong. As consumers, students should demand more for their money. The issues of quality, experience and expectations for every faculty member should be made available to all students. It is time for us to see what we are paying for. Yet why has there been no real effort before now to make this information available to students? We will work to make the results of these evaluations available to students in published form. Ideally, we would like to see this information made available to students in time for enrollment purposes.

Campus safety is another important area that merits mentioning. First of all, it is important to set the record straight. There are already many surveillance cameras mounted on buildings throughout campus. Our opponents simply say they favor cameras. Well, we do, too.

Let us go further, though. We enthusiastically support the idea of a total inventory check-up. If needed, we should upgrade or replace outdated emergency telephones, walkway lights and surveillance cameras. The University should pay for these items. It is outrageous that some students do not feel safe on their campus. We should do better, and students should demand no less.

We would be remiss if we did not mention the perennial parking issue. When the University sells more parking permits than there are stalls, students are being jilted. The administration should not take away student spaces without replacing them on campus.

Also, students who have a permit should be allowed to park at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex without forking over more money to buy another permit. Making students buy a separate permit for the Rec is simply double taxation for the same service. Students do not have pockets that deep.

Finally, we would like to talk about safety inspections for students living in rental housing. We realize a large portion of K-State students live in rental units off-campus. Students living in these conditions should be protected from slum landlords. We support a mandatory, city-wide safety inspection code for all landlords. Students should not have to worry about their personal safety — especially if they are paying rent to someone to take care of these concerns. Student renters should be treated as people, not just as a cash source for slumlords.

In closing, we would like to again stress our commitment to K-State students. We have each served two years as student senators. We were "hired" to make tough decisions on behalf of students. We stand behind our record of fighting increased fees and actively seeking student input. While we do not expect everyone to agree with us, we do hope all students will recognize our determination to make students' lives better here at K-State.

If you have any questions or suggestions concerning our stand on the issues that affect student life, please do not hesitate to contact us via our web site (<http://www.ksu.edu/~ledoux>). Thank you for your consideration. Vote LeDoux and Wiedeman, because actions speak louder than words.

Trent LeDoux is a senior in animal science. Brent Wiedeman is a senior in agricultural education.

► UNBIASED COVERAGE NEEDED ABOUT TAIWAN

Editor,

I have read the recent editions of the Collegian, with two letters from Professor Chii-Dong Lin. To my great surprise, these two letters appeared on the front page of the Collegian, which is supposed to cover hard news. But these two letters are basically personal opinions. Even the "personal account" is by no means a personal account. The letter is just expressing opinions.

I do hope you can also publish different opinions on this issue. As a person from China, I know the opinions are very different.

► WHY DOESN'T MEN'S TEAM STAND FOR ANTHEM?

Editor,

The recent suspension of NBA player Mahmoud Abdul-Rauf created one of the biggest controversies, refusing to stand during the national anthem because of his Islamic beliefs.

During my educational experience at K-State, I volunteered to sing the national anthem at several men's and women's basketball games at Bramlage Coliseum. Why is it the K-State men are not on the floor standing in line in a dignified posture during the anthem, and the women are?

The NBA's rule is very clear on this issue, because Abdul-Rauf was fined $14,000 and has now agreed to stand during the anthem.

The K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics needs to realize the message it sends to young athletes in our state. The few minutes of silence during the anthem has a lot of meaning to many people, and I feel the K-State men's basketball team should show its respect to our country's flag and those who fought for our country by being present during the national anthem.

Candidates must address student apathy

As of 5 p.m. Monday, "Litter-the-Campus '96" officially kicks off.

That is, of course, K-State's own Academy Awards show: student body elections. In 1996, the year of the chicken, we students can look forward to more platforms than a drag queen show.

The typical campaign platform consists of a few significant ingredients: saving students' money, protecting students and a few other recycled ideas stolen from the candidate who won last year. Presto. We have created our vision for K-State.

What these faux-intellectual platforms fail at providing are results. Sure, they can say they want to increase campus safety, but they are not going to start a foot patrol with Student Senate.

Most of the time, the issues the candidates discuss have or will have been taken care of in some way or another by some other campus function or person, but this gives the candidate something to point at and say "I was a part of that" after it has been accomplished.

Myview

RUSSELL Fortmeyer

Student apathy on this campus is nothing new, but it is one of those issues that will not go away, no one speaks about on record and few people care about.

Candidates say these things because they sound good: sound bites.

Now, it is pretty hard to use sound bites in a campaign that has one media source, the Collegian, but a candidate can hardly waste precious time and resources announcing a bold proposal that might change the way student government runs. They will not do that, because no one cares.

No one is going to listen to a thoughtful discussion on the student group allocation process and how equal and fair it is to everyone on campus. Doing this might actually make those comedic presidential debates relevant. Who would want to go and do that?

Student apathy on this campus is nothing new, but it is one of those issues that will not go away, no one speaks about on record and few people care about. Students on this campus are apathetic about discussing the topic of apathy.

The harsh truth of the matter is most of the so-called problems hindering students at K-State are due to their own lack of interest. How can you talk a student out of attending a beauty contest at a bar in Aggieville to instead attend a State of the University address by President Jon Wefald?

Now, even I will admit a State of the University address is not on my list of things to do before the year 2045, but it is a good place to start becoming politically aware.

Heaven forbid students should actually attend a Student Senate meeting. Why do you think people wait in line for hours to sit in the U.S. Senate gallery to gawk at senators? It is sometimes funny and fairly interesting, but they do learn something about process.

A K-State senate meeting is not much different. However, at K-State you can talk to senators, you can talk in open period, you can bring food and you can even pre-party in Union Station. Unfortunately, there is no mechanical bull, and they are not televised on C-Span.

It is not only this collective apathy which casts its gloom over student government, but a more specific lack of interest related to University committees.

There are a couple dozen University committees relating to everything from religion and athletics (not much difference between the two, in these parts) to parking and health. These committees have been developed to advise the administration concerning their relative issues.

For example, when parking fines go up five dollars, it is not Wefald who makes that decision. The Parking Council votes on it and passes it on to Tom Rawson, vice president of administration and finance, who has the option of passing it on to Wefald or dismissing it. Wefald can then submit it to the Board of Regents or dismiss it.

If students are not involved with the issue in the committee process, they never will be. There are many instances, such as the proposed parking garage in Memorial Stadium, that stand out as cases where Senate was forced to respond at the last minute to affect the outcome. Why? No students were involved in the process which created the proposal.

Whose fault is this lack of participation? The University administration usually gives ample opportunity for students to get involved.

The problem lies in the appointment and responsibility of appointees. The student body president and the Student Senate chair generally appoint students to University committees. This is usually a tough job because there are few students willing to be appointed.

But, after these appointments are made, there is absolutely no guarantee these students will ever attend meetings or report to student government.

If our candidates truly want to solve student problems, they will turn the tables back on the students. By doing this, we not only create a campus influenced by a variety of students, we show the administration that a united student voice means business.

Minimum wage awaits vote

QUICK read

► Clinton wants Senate Republicans to stop blocking a vote on raising the federal minimum wage. Clinton proposes a hike of 90 cents.

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Clinton pressed the Republican-controlled Senate on Saturday to stop blocking a vote on raising the minimum wage because "we should not leave behind anyone who is willing to work hard."

Making the case in personal terms, Clinton said that while a senator's pay has increased by a third over the past five years, the wages of millions of American workers have been stuck at $4.25 an hour.

"It's hard to raise a family on $4.25 an hour," Clinton said in his weekly radio address. "We must make sure the minimum wage is a living wage."

Clinton and congressional Democrats propose to raise the minimum wage to $5.15 in two 45-cent steps over the next two years.

As it stands, Clinton said, the purchasing power of the minimum wage will fall to a 40-year low this year if Congress does not act.

On Thursday, in a 55-45 roll call, Democrats fell five votes short of the 60 needed to shut off Senate debate and force a vote on an amendment to boost the minimum wage. During the debate, Republicans accused the Democrats of raising the issue to embarrass Senate Majority Leader Bob Dole, Clinton's certain opponent in the November election.

"I challenge the Republican majority to stop blocking a vote and let the majority rule," Clinton said.

"In fact, you need to know that a member of Congress who refuses to allow the minimum wage to come up for a vote made more money during last year's one-month government shutdown than a minimum-wage worker makes in an entire year," the president said.

In 1989, a U.S. senator's salary was $101,900. It has stood at $133,600 since 1993.

Dole, vacationing in Bal Harbour, Fla., said of Clinton's assertion: "He tried to slip it in there. It's not coming up under regular process. It's all politics. It's unfortunate. We'll take a look at it."

Sen. Fred Thompson, R-Tenn., did not refer directly to the minimum wage issue in delivering the GOP's official radio response to Clinton's address.

Instead he called the president a roadblock to Republican efforts to reform the welfare system, balance the budget and provide middle-class tax relief.

"The president still claims to be for these reforms while he continues to do everything he can to stop them," Thompson said.

"The president certainly doesn't have a problem with vision," he said. "He has a problem of double vision. He's both for and against a balanced budget, welfare reform and middle class tax relief, depending on which group he is appealing to at the moment."

Clinton, in his address, said that for the lowest paid workers, "the minimum wage has stayed unchanged while the cost of living goes up."

He said that for a parent working full time, the increase he proposes "would help pay for groceries for seven months, or four months of rent, or months of child care."

The White House said the raise Clinton proposes — 90 cents over two years — "will mean an additional $1,800 in earnings for full-time minimum wage workers."

"Raising the minimum wage would honor both work and family," Clinton said. "We should not leave behind anyone who is willing to work hard as our country moves forward."

Pittsburg State student found dead in apartment

■ Authorities refuse to say how student died, despite an autopsy

Associated Press

PITTSBURG — Detectives investigating the killing of a Pittsburg State student refused to discuss the case Monday, as other students returned to campus after spring break.

A task force of 18 investigators was working on the case of Carrie Arlene Williams, of Parsons, who was found dead in her apartment Saturday afternoon.

Authorities have refused to say how she died, although an autopsy was performed Sunday.

"We are taking this situation very seriously," Pittsburg State president John Darling said. "We are concerned for the family and their loss. I met with the family Sunday evening, and I know they are suffering."

A friend found the body after Williams failed to keep a date to go shopping and was late for work Saturday. The body was found on the floor of the apartment.

The friend called the apartment several times before going there and asking the landlord to let her into the apartment, where she discovered the body about noon.

Williams, a top tennis player and honor student, was planning to be married, according to her pastor, J.C. Kelly of Wesley United Methodist Church in Parsons. He said he had talked to her Wednesday to set a date to meet and begin planning the wedding.

Darling said there will be a campus-wide meeting Tuesday to allow students to talk about the killing.

The university has increased campus security, will have meetings for students living in dormitories and will make counseling available to any student who wants it, said James Taylor, vice president for student affairs.

Williams made several tennis records at Parsons High School and at Labette County Community College before enrolling at Pittsburg State, her coach, John Seal, said.

"I taught her how to play," Seal said. "She wasn't very fast. She wasn't very big, but she just didn't give up."

Williams was popular in high school, liked to dress well and was interested in fashion design, Principal George Tignor said.

"She didn't have an enemy in the world," Seal said. "I never saw her not smile."

Freemen rally draws only 8 supporters

■ Participants were outnumbered 4 to 1 by reporters, TV crews

Associated Press

LEWISTOWN, Mont. — A rally called to show support for the Montana Freemen drew eight people Monday instead of the hundreds predicted by organizers, who insisted their ranks would grow as the week progressed.

The Freemen supporters, outnumbered 4 to 1 by reporters and TV camera crews, held court at a paint-chipped picnic table in a snow-covered campground west of town.

The rally was about 120 miles west of the remote Garfield County farm where the militants are holed up and surrounded by more than 100 FBI agents.

Participants said they would remain as long as the standoff continues and pitched two small tents at the campground. Organizer Ed LeStage predicted attendance would increase as supporters around the country see news of the encampment.

"The word is going out," said LeStage, a spokesman for the Freemen Patriots of the Northwest, based in Kamiah, Idaho, and — despite its name — unaffiliated with the Montana Freemen.

"We're here for the duration," he said. "We'll be staying until the FBI leaves Jordan. We're in the early stage of a long rally."

Another rally organizer, Chad

Erickson, said the gathering was in Lewistown because it is far enough away from the standoff that law enforcement officials won't be unduly concerned.

FBI agents have twice stopped a pair of sympathizers trying to reach the compound.

The Freemen, who have named their 960-acre compound Justus Township, deny the legitimacy of the government and have set up their own laws and their own courts.

Neighbors said the group has built bunkers and openly stockpiled food, fuel and weapons — possibly including military armaments.

The compound has been surrounded by more than 100 FBI agents since a week ago today, when LeRoy Schweitzer and Daniel Petersen Jr., two Freemen leaders, were arrested.

A third member of the group, Richard E. Clark, surrendered Saturday and was arraigned Monday on charges including conspiracy, mail and bank fraud, and planning to kidnap and murder a federal judge.

In court, he refused to confirm his identity, repeatedly said the court had no jurisdiction over him and said the charges were false.

He refused a court-appointed lawyer and would not enter a plea. U.S. Magistrate Richard Anderson entered an innocent plea on Clark's behalf.

Schweitzer and Petersen were charged with threatening public officials and millions of dollars worth of bank, financial and mail fraud.

Jailers said he had refused to be fingerprinted or photographed and would not speak or eat.

Authorities won't say how many people are still at the farm, but 12 of them are believed to be wanted on various state and federal charges.

We're here for the duration. We'll be staying until the FBI leaves Jordan. We're in the early stage of a long rally.

Wildcats hope No. 13 is their lucky number

■ One of K-State's own was a member of the Shockers' club. He returns to Wichita as a Wildcat for the first time

Shana Newell
sports editor

When most high school baseball players dream of playing Division I baseball, Wichita State is the school that first comes to mind for Kansas kids. So it was with K-State first baseman Jason Bichelmeyer.

He spent three years on the Wichita State baseball team. Bichelmeyer redshirted his freshman year. He battled against injuries and for playing time the following two years. Now he's with K-State's squad.

Why would anyone who was a member of a perennially, nationally-ranked baseball team want to leave that team?

Furthermore, why would he take what most would consider a step down and join a ballclub that is working hard to gain respect from its conference opponents, let alone the nation?

For Bichelmeyer, a junior from Louisburg, the answer to these questions wasn't a simple one, but it came from the heart.

"Being able to contribute on a quality baseball team," he said. "I spent all those times in the cages down in Wichita when I was hurt or when I wasn't getting to play. When I spent that time on the bench, I would think of how good it would feel to play on a quality team and to say that you went out and played 100 percent."

And playing 100 percent is exactly what Coach Mike Clark said Bichelmeyer does as a Wildcat.

"When I first saw Jason play, I liked absolutely everything about him," Clark said. "But he works hard at baseball and takes it seriously. He is a hard-nosed player, and that's what I liked most. Sometimes times get rough, and Jason likes that. He's an awfully hard worker."

Bichelmeyer said baseball wasn't what he originally intended to play. In fact, football and basketball were the sports that drew most of his attention in high school.

So what changed?
"I wasn't really into baseball until probably my junior year of high school. And then some scouts started taking a look at me. I really didn't

DARREN WHITLEY/Collegian

Jason Bichelmeyer fouls off a ball while attempting to bunt against a University of Illinois-Chicago pitcher last week at Frank Myers Field. Bichelmeyer is hitting .277 on the year with three home runs, six doubles and 25 RBI.

n't get into it too much until I realized I could be pretty good at this if I worked at it," Bichelmeyer said. "I wasn't a highly recruited player out of high school. I lucked out to end up on Wichita State's team because a couple of scouts had seen me play and passed the word down. I really didn't know where I was going until the beginning of the summer out of my senior year."

K-State's program enticed Bichelmeyer to Manhattan, and he said he enjoys playing for the Cats much more than the Shockers. In his words, K-State is hungry.

"I like being on this team rather than the Wichita State team, better, just because we're hungry here, you know? It's exciting to be a part of this team. We have a great team, and we haven't really played up to our potential, yet," he said. "If we do sweep Wichita State in two games tomorrow (Tuesday), that would just be a lot of weight moving in the right direction for momentum into the second half of the season tomorrow. I think that'll carry us and get us on the roll that we need."

Does Bichelmeyer feel the Cats have the ability to defeat No. 3 ranked Wichita State?

"I feel that we should. And if we do, it will be the start of the respect we will start to get," he said.

Clark said since Bichelmeyer's arrival on the K-State squad last fall, the junior has fit in nicely with the program.

"He's a good, solid kid. He's very good defensively at first base, and he's made a nice adjustment offensively into what his role at K-State is," Clark said.

And exactly what is that role?

"He's a left-handed bat with power. He's been a real nice fit into our lineup. He's put up decent numbers and been in a good groove," Clark said.

"Jason hits his own pitch. He's not chasing balls out of the strike zone."

No, he's not. He's too busy chasing down a dream.

■ In their last 12 meetings, K-State has been unable to stop the Wichita State Shockers. Coach Mike Clark and the Cats try to end that streak today

John Berggren
staff writer

The Wildcats will try to break a 12-game losing streak to the Shockers that dates back to April 1992. Last year on the road the Cats lost 5-3 at Salina and 7-6 at Wichita State.

In the last match-up, the first this season, the Shockers beat the Cats at home, 7-4, in a game in which K-State had four errors. The Shockers scored three runs in the top of the sixth to tie the game at four and went on to score three more in the top of the ninth to win the game.

K-State coach Mike Clark said his team learned a lot in the last match-up with Wichita State.

"We learned we can play with them," Clark said. "We needed to continue our offense. We scored four runs early, and then our bats went dead. They've got great arms but we can make adjustments. We are at a stage where we are anxious to play them again."

The Cats will send Chris Traylor to the mound in the first game and Jon Oiseth in the second game. Traylor is 2-0 with a 4.24 ERA coming into the game, and Oiseth 4-1 leads the staff pitching a 3.62 ERA.

Clark said he did not treat No. 3 nationally ranked Wichita State differently than any other team in preparation for the contests.

"We need to play good defense and take advantage of all of the advantages we get on offense," he said.

Clark said coming into the game his team was in pretty good shape health wise.

"We've got a few nicks," Clark said.

Jason Bichelmeyer missed time against Iowa State because of the flu, and Heath Schesser missed the Iowa State games because of a strained hamstring. By the time the game comes around tomorrow we should be close to 100 percent.

Most of all the Cats are looking at this game as a gut check to their program.

"They've got a quality program," Clark said. "If we want to become a quality program we need to do good against quality teams like Wichita State."

1997 World Series champions will be the Atlanta Braves

After viewing the first day of Major League baseball games, I thought I might let you know how the season should unfold.

First, let's look at the National League:

National League East The National League has belonged to the Atlanta Braves in the 1990s. There is no reason for the dominance to stop now. Its pitching staff is one of the best ever.

■ Florida Marlins The addition of outfielder Devon White and pitcher Kevin Brown will make this team a legitimate wildcard team. If Gary Sheffield can remain healthy, this team will put up a lot of wins.

■ New York Mets The Mets have followed the Braves' pattern, building a team around young, talented pitchers. It was no fluke that this team went 44-31 after the All-Star break last year.

■ Montrea Expos. They have some great players, but will they get rid of them? The team is under heavy financial constraints and will probably not be able to keep all of their star players.

■ Philadelphia Phillies Major problem with the pitching staff. Curt Schilling and David West are coming off surgeries in the off-season. Their ace appears to be Sid "give me another ho-ho" Fernandez.

National League West

■ Los Angeles Dodgers The best pitching staff in the division gives them the edge over their opponents. Replacing Jose "Mr. Error" Offerman with Greg Gagne was a brilliant move defensively. The addition of third baseman Mike Blowers will give them a boost offensively.

■ Colorado Rockies They won't win the division, because their pitching is just not good. The only thing keeping this team from the bottom of the division is its offensive punch.

■ San Diego Padres The addition of Ricky Henderson and Wally Joyner to the team is a major upgrade. Along with the steady hitting of Tony Gwynn and Ken Caminiti, the Padres could surprise some people. Question mark lies with the pitching staff.

■ San Francisco Giants They finished at the bottom last year. Expect the same this season. Awful pitching will be the downfall this season much like last season.

National League Central

■ St. Louis Cardinals Tony LaRussa brought some expensive but talented free agents with him. Offensive production was brought in with the likes of Ron Gant and Gary Gaetti. The addition of Andy Benes and closer Dennis Eckersley to the pitching staff boosts this team to first place.

■ Cincinnati Reds Can Eric Davis and Chris Sabo bring back memories of the 1990 championship team? No. But the Reds have a shot at the wildcard because of good pitching from Jose Rijo and Pete Schourek.

■ Chicago Cubs Sammy

Sosa is one of the best outfielders in the game right now. Look for him to challenge for league MVP rights. But the Cubs battle will be to keep the Pirates below them all year.

■ Pittsburgh Pirates No talent. Playoffs: Braves, Cardinals, Dodgers and wild-card team Reds. Braves advance to the World Series.

American League Central

■ Cleveland Indians The best offensive lineup from top to bottom in the major leagues. No major changes from last year's squad means another first place finish.

■ Chicago White Sox Good young pitching combined with the good offensive power will allow the Sox to be a lot closer than last year's gap.

■ Minnesota Twins Kirby Puckett isn't slowing down, and Marty Cordova is going to be a great one. Young and inexperienced pitching keeps this team down.

■ Kansas City Royals If Kevin Appier could produce for the whole season, they could finish above the Twins. Bob Hamelin will not be the offensive answer. Give the Royals a couple more years.

■ Milwaukee Brewers Just not enough talent to challenge anyone.

American League West

■ Seattle Mariners One of the best comeback teams in the majors. Randy Johnson is a strong enough pitcher to carry the team. Remember, the Mariners' success last year was without the services of Junior for half the year.

■ California Angels The left-handed pitchers of Chuck Finley, Mark Langston and Jim Abbott will allow the Halos to challenge the Mariners.

■ Texas Rangers If Juan Gonzalez doesn't stay healthy, this team is sunk.

■ Oakland A's When LaRussa left, he took a lot with him. Offensive slugger Mark McGwire is out indefinitely with a foot injury.

American League East

■ Baltimore Orioles Terrific rotation with Mike Mussina, David Wells, Kent Mercker and Scott Erickson. Great closer in Randy Myers. With the addition of Roberto Alomar, the Orioles become one of the best in the American League.

■ New York Yankees With the additions of Tim Lincecum, Tino Martinez and Kenny Rogers, the Yankees are a definite playoff team.

■ Boston Red Sox They have some power with Kevin Mitchell and Jose Canseco. But neither is a good defensive player in the outfield. The question is can Roger Clemens stay healthy?

■ Toronto Blue Jays The loss of Roberto Alomar, Paul Molitor and Devon White is just too much.

■ Detroit Tigers The worst pitching in the American League will equal the worst finish.

Playoffs: The Mariners, Orioles, Yankees and the Indians. The Indians will just barely get by the Orioles to advance. They eventually fall to the Braves again in the World Series in six games.

Cats sweep Washington State, UNLV

Shane McCormick
contributing writer

The K-State women's tennis team gained some confidence heading into its Big 8 opening matches this weekend. The Wildcats were able to pick up wins over both Washington State and UNLV.

In the first part of a doubleheader, the Cats smashed Washington State, 6-0.

The Cats started off the dual by sweeping all six singles matches. Improving her spring record to 7-0 was senior Karina Kuregian. Kuregian easily defeated Marcia Senn of Washington State, 6-0, 6-1.

Also continuing her successful spring campaign was sophomore Yana Dorodnova. Dorodnova defeated Andria Reisz, 6-2, 6-1. The win improved Dorodnova's record to 8-1.

The only close match for the Cats in singles came at the No. 4 spot, where junior Karen Nicholson was able to hold off Helen Frankland. After taking the first set 6-3, Nicholson lost the second 6-7 (6-8). Frankland retired from the match in the third set.

The doubles portion of the dual was not played.

The second half of the doubleheader provided a little bit more excitement for the Cats. The Cats started off the dual against 41st-ranked UNLV by splitting the six singles matches.

Continuing her impressive season was Kuregian, who pulled off a three-set victory. Kuregian lost the first set to Lisa Annebro 6-7. But she came back to take the second and third sets, 6-3 and 6-3.

Coach Steve Bietau said Kuregian is just about at the top of her game again.

"She is not physically where she was before, but she's very close," he said. "The Graves' Disease is basically a non-factor now."

Losing for only the second time this season was Dorodnova. Dorodnova lost the first set to Marianne Vallin, 6-2. She was able to battle back in the second to tie the set up at 6-6. But Dorodnova lost the set in the tie-breaker.

"Vallin is a really tough player," Bietau said. "It took a while for Yana to get back in to the match, and that hurt her."

Picking up the third win in singles for the Cats was sophomore Dinah Watson. Watson defeated Jeannette Fylpaa, 6-2, 6-1. While battling shoulder problems, Watson started off the season at 0-2. But since then, she has reeled off four straight wins.

"Her shoulder is still tender a little bit," Bietau said. "But it is obvious that she's having success on the court."

After splitting the singles matches, the doubles matches became crucial to see which team would win the dual.

The Cats earned the doubles point and the match by gaining two of the three victories. Picking up a crucial win for the Cats was junior Nikki Lagerstrom and Watson at No. 3 doubles. They defeated Annebro and Marie Linusson 8-5.

"I am really proud of how Nikki and Dinah are playing," Bietau said. "They are both coming on and playing great tennis."

The next action for the Cats will come this weekend as they open Big 8 play. On Saturday, the Cats will take on Nebraska. The following day, they will face Iowa State. All matches will be played at the L.P. Washburn Tennis Complex.

► NCAA TOURNAMENT CHAMPIONSHIP

Kentucky dances away with win

Associated Press

EAST RUTHERFORD, N.J. — Kentucky has its first national championship in 18 years, the one it was supposed to win all season.

The Wildcats got it with a 76-67 victory over Syracuse on Monday night, a loss that earned the Orangemen the respect few gave them going in.

The sixth national title in school history, second only to UCLA's 11, came through the scoring of senior Tony Delk and freshman Ron Mercer. And, of course, the famed pressure defense and the ability to use college basketball's deepest roster.

"We're a little bit like the Green Bay Packers," Kentucky coach Rick Pitino said. "The entire state of Kentucky owns our basketball team."

Syracuse, a 14-point underdog, has the most NCAA Tournament victories without a title. A 36th NCAA win would have meant a first national championship.

Now, this Syracuse team joins the one-point losers to Indiana in the 1987 championship game in sustaining the most bitter defeats in school history.

"We knew it would be tough," Syracuse coach Jim Boheim said. "Kentucky made a couple of great plays when they had to. Delk is a great senior and a great player."

Delk, voted the outstanding player, finished with 24 points and tied the championship game record with seven 3-pointers. The Wildcats finished with 12 threes, critical in cracking Syracuse's 2-3 zone. Kentucky tied the championship game record for 3s by a team.

Syracuse played only three reserves. It took one shot and did not score.

Mercer came up with a career-high 20 points, all but six of the points the deep Kentucky bench provided. More important, the extra bodies enabled the Wildcats to keep up the defensive pressure; Syracuse finished with 24 turnovers, 19 more than it had in the semifinal win over Mississippi State.

John Wallace, the senior who returned to school rather than enter the NBA last year, finished with 29 points and 10 rebounds. But he left the game in tears when he fouled out with 1:06 to play and Kentucky leading 72-67.

"I'm proud of my guys," Boheim said. "They came back. My kids had so much heart all year and in this tournament, and I think they gained respect. I told them at halftime, it is enough when you give everything you have."

Judge allows drugs back into evidence

QUICKread

► A federal judge who threw out a confession and drug evidence said additional testimony changed his ruling. He came under attack from the White House for his initial ruling.

Associated Press

NEW YORK — A federal judge who came under attack from the White House on down for throwing out a confession and 80 pounds of cocaine and heroin reversed himself Monday and reinstated the evidence.

U.S. District Judge Harold Baer Jr. said additional testimony from police and the defendant caused him to switch his initial ruling.

The judge had ruled that police officers violated the rights of Carol Bayless of Detroit by pulling over her car in New York City on April 21 because four men around it hurried away when they noticed police.

Police found the drugs in her trunk. But Baer said in his original ruling that the evidence was inadmissible because it was only natural in that neighborhood for black men to fear police and run away.

Sen. Bob Dole, R. Kan. had said the judge should be impeached, and House Speaker Newt Gingrich had charged that Baer's ruling was "the perfect reason why we are losing our civilization."

The White House called the judge's ruling "wrongheaded" and threatened to ask him to quit. Clinton appointed Baer in 1994.

In his reversal Monday, Baer apologized for the inference in his original ruling that it is common to run from police in Manhattan's gritty Washington Heights section because of past corruption.

"Unfortunately, the hyperbole regrettably may have demeaned the law-abiding men and women who make Washington Heights their home and the vast majority of the dedicated men and women in blue who patrol the streets of our great city," he wrote.

Prosecutor Guy Petrillo said "Good," when told of Baer's change of mind.

Bayless' attorney, Ramon W. Pagan, said Monday he was disappointed with the switch.

"The outside pressure I believe influenced him," he said.

The case now will be readied for trial, although Bayless had indicated that she may pursue a plea agreement. She is charged with conspiracy to distribute cocaine and heroin and remains jailed without bail.

After being criticized by local, state and national politicians, Baer agreed in an unusual move to reopen a hearing on suppressing the evidence so more information could be presented.

Later, the White House appeared to back off, telling a congressman in a letter that while Clinton believes the judge was "grievously wrong," he supports the independence of the judiciary.

U.S. Attorney Mary Jo White, whose office stood to lose the case, took the unusual step of writing to the judge to acknowledge there had been "inappropriate rhetoric" about his ruling. She defended the freedom from political pressure that is enjoyed by federal judges, who have lifetime appointments.

Four senior judges for the second U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals took the unusual step of writing a statement saying threats to remove Baer "threaten to weaken the constitutional structure of this nation."

Kickapoo Nation to open casino

■ Background checks for employees cause delay in hiring

Associated Press

TOPEKA — The Kickapoo Nation is ready to get into the casino business.

The tribe has 315 electronic slot machines, six tables for blackjack, a craps table and a restaurant that will hold more than 50 people. In about three months, it will have a roulette wheel.

It just does not have enough people who can work right now.

The Kansas Bureau of Investigation is flooded with applications for background checks for potential casino employees, with no additional agents to handle them.

The background checks are required under compacts the state signed with the Kickapoo and the three other tribes in northeast Kansas. They are the Prairie Band Potawatomi, the Iowa and the Sac and Fox.

"We did everything on our part," Fred Thomas, Kickapoo tribal chairman, said. "We're just waiting for the state. We haven't heard anything. It's really in the state's court right now."

The KBI has completed only five of the more than 170 applications for background checks for casino workers.

"We certainly understand the Kickapoo tribe's concern," Assistant KBI Director Dale Finger said. "I wish we could accommodate them on a more timely basis."

The Kickapoo Nation has converted a bingo hall into a casino, renovating the interior and expanding it to add office space.

It is on the Kickapoo reservation, about 45 miles north of Topeka and six miles west of Horton on Kansas Highway 20.

Finger said background checks — for top casino management, the security director, vendors and other key people — are the most time consuming. Such checks generally involve out of state travel, he said.

The tribe is required to deposit $3,000 per application for the KBI to perform such background checks.

The checks for dealers, floor workers and money cage workers take two or three days, Finger said.

If background checks are not completed within 90 days, the Kickapoo Gambling Commission can issue temporary licenses for the individuals and they can start work under the compact.

Natalie Haag, executive director of the state Gaming Agency, said five pending applications are 80 days old. Another 50 are more than 45 days old.

The background checks must be done on the company that provided the gambling equipment to the tribe, and the principals in that company, she said.

At this point, the Legislature has not appropriated any additional money for the KBI to conduct the background checks, Finger said. Whenever a KBI agent works on a background check, time is taken away from a criminal investigation, he added.

Finger said a half-dozen agents are working on the Kickapoo background checks, but they also are continuing their work on criminal cases.

Thomas said it should not take long.

"Most of the personnel come right from the local area," he said.

Main witness takes stand in fraud trial

Associated Press

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. — The small-time banker who claims President Clinton pressured him to make a $300,000 loan took the stand in the fraud trial of Clinton's Whitewater partners Monday as the case entered its most critical phase yet.

David Hale, whose allegations are central to the Whitewater investigation, began his testimony in routine fashion, recounting how he came to know Clinton, Gov. Jim Guy Tucker and James McDougal, a fraternity buddy of Hale's from the University of Arkansas.

Hale, who is expected to testify the rest of the week, is the government's star witness against Tucker, McDougal and McDougal's ex-wife, Susan.

The three are on trial on charges of obtaining $3 million in federally backed loans under false pretenses.

The McDougals were partners with the president and Hillary Rodham Clinton in the Whitewater land development from 1978 to 1992. The McDougals also owned Madison Guaranty Savings and Loan.

Hale was sentenced last week to more than two years in prison and ordered to make $2 million in restitution to the Small Business Administration for misrepresenting to the SBA the amount of capital available to his lending company, Capital Management Services.

The charges against Tucker and the McDougals center on loans made from Madison and Capital Management 10 years ago.

Hale claims that Clinton, as governor in 1986, pressured him to lend Susan McDougal $300,000.

Clinton said the claim is a bunch of bull.

The president will videotape his testimony at the White House on April 27; it will be shown to the jury later.

Hale also is expected to testify about an $825,000 real estate loan that is central to the government's case.

Bill Watt, who did legal work for Hale in the 1980s, testified last week that Hale told him Clinton was pressuring him to close the $825,000 transaction.

Watt quoted Hale as saying in 1985: "I've been to a meeting ... and Gov. Clinton wants to get it done. He's got to help his friends."

help or hindrance?

It is the glue of the Internet, but e-mail must be mastered before it can become a helpful tool story by AbdullNaser T. Abdullah

For many of us, the Internet provides the information superhighway. Along its scenic path is an overabundance of roadside stops containing electronic libraries, facts, figures and access to interesting people around the world.

One of the roadside stops is electronic mail. E-mail is the most frequently used facility for most members of the Internet community.

E-mail is the glue of the Internet and its community. It is also the glue between the Internet and the rest of the on-line world that connects to the Internet.

Tens of millions of people use e-mail in the course of their everyday professional and personal activities. Entire companies such as Apple, Borland, Digital Equipment, Lotus and Microsoft literally run on e-mail, as do many universities.

According to Matrix News newsletter, the total world e-mail community is estimated at 20 to 30 million people in 130 countries.

E-mail simply is a way for computer users to exchange messages among different offices, organizations, cities, countries or even in space, as one U.S. space shuttle swapped e-mail with users back on Earth.

E-mail is a versatile communications system and can be used for a variety of things. Sending messages, files and programs are just a few jobs that e-mail does.

Here at K-State, e-mail is being used in many classes for submitting homework assignments, projects and to voice opinions on different topics.

"It is a good way to communicate," said Rebecca Gould, associate professor of hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics.

It is an efficient use of time, which is also environmentally friendly, she said.

"In my class of 108 (students), 80 percent have user IDs," she said. Although most students have user IDs, not all are familiar with e-mail and are forced to use computers. Every semester, minor problems up when using e-mail. Most of students who are new to e-mail to be taught how to use it properly Gould said.

Sometimes students would their work to the wrong account she said.

Gould has a listserv set up for a class where all students can argue and comment on points using e-mail. She said by using e-mail, students feel more comfortable saying this would not usually say to someone's face.

An advantage of using e-mail. You have an assignment due at 4:30 p.m., and it is 4:30 now. You have time to find the instructor or somewhere to drop it in a box, but not anymore. With e-mail, you can send in your assignment at 4:59, and it will be there in a matter of seconds.

"I think e-mail is a step into the 21st century," said Nada Mohammad senior in hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics. She said technology goes hand-in-hand.

"Today, more instructors are to submit work through e-mail," said.

At first, Mohammad found it hard to learn using e-mail, but after became fun and easy to use.

"E-mail is like television and a necessity," Mohammad said.

On an average day, Mohammad checks her e-mail at least three times.

Using a listserv as a place for discussion was an interesting experience, she said.

"It really made the learning experience more personal," Mohammad said. Using the listserv allowed Mohammad to express her opinions and get to know her classmates better.

An instructor recalls using e-mail in classes six semesters ago.

During the first semester of using e-mail, students knew nothing about it, and nobody had a user ID, said Betsy Barrett, assistant professor of hotel, restaurant, institution management and dietetics.

Barrett said she likes the time efficiency of e-mail and thinks it is less personal.

"This is the way we are going to be communicating in the future," she said. Barrett said she encourages students to use e-mail not only to submit assignments but also to talk to their friends and make new ones.

Robert Rook, instructor in history, also has a listserv set up for his History of the Middle East class. Students discuss matters related to class and share relevant information.

Rook also uses the listserv to distribute weekly reading assignments, exam study guides and essay questions.

The listserv facilitates communication between the students and the instructor. Rook said. This is the first semester Rook has used a listserv.

Rook said he is not comfortable with students submitting materials by e-mail because things might get lost.

A diversion is needed because it is easier, and there is not a well enough established etiquette, Rook said.

1991-92 saw a number of e-mail related lawsuits, ranging from accusations of invasion of privacy to misuse of company resources.

One common theme in privacy-related disputes is a lack of policies and a lack of employee education by employers.

E-mail can be useful.

Once you get the hang of it and begin using e-mail to communicate with people for work and other activities, you will find yourself using it as naturally as you do the telephone or a fax machine.

You will know when you are a serious e-mail user when your first question is no longer "What's your phone number?" but "What's your e-mail address?"

ADRIAN FLEMING/Collegian

The Fortmeyer Files

This week
Mike Marlett

senior in print journalism and K-State Collegian editor in chief

Russell: Politically — is this the hardest job on campus?

Mike: You can never please everybody. One of the hardest things about the Collegian is, unlike anybody else's job, we're out there showing everything we do every day, every week, every month.

We're on public display. When we do things right, no one says anything; and if we do it wrong, they tell us right away. That's stressful.

Russell: Ultimately, you're responsible for what the paper prints, right?

Mike: It's all my responsibility — which is a heavy burden. Especially when you look at how little control I actually have over things.

It's not that I don't have the authority to control content. After I do my regular job, I don't have the time to read every article. I hire people to make sure that is done for me.

Russell: How influential do you think the Collegian is? Are students greatly swayed by the Collegian?

MATT HAWKINS/Collegian

Mike: I think we're very influential. I think, however, we never know what we're going to write that is going to influence people.

For example, if we go into depth on how to get a student loan, we may not enlighten many people.

However, if we do some benign article on winterizing your car, we may get six letters to the editor about it. We never know what is going to hit or miss with the public. The best we can do is look at it and say, "We're students, and what interests us?"

Russell: How important is the paper in covering city issues?

Mike: I really think covering city issues is very important. To be honest, we lose a lot of things to the Merc (Manhattan Mercury) because of resources. Of course, the campus comes first with us, so we put most of our resources into covering the campus and campus government.

The city comes second. It's still where we live and work, so we certainly can't ignore it.

Russell: How much can the Collegian be a watchful eye or consumer advocate on campus?

Mike: I think that's the role of any good journalistic source — to look out for people who don't have the time to spend wondering what is the best deal and if politicians are telling them the right thing.

Russell: Why do you think it's important for the Collegian to endorse candidates in the student body elections?

Mike: One of the things that's hardest for us to get across in our articles is a feel for the candidate. One of the reasons that is really difficult is because a lot of our reporters are novice reporters. They don't necessarily cover them with the color or the flare a professional, experienced journalist might.

It's harder to get a feel for what these candidates are saying or doing without throwing real opinion in there.

The editorial board, which is mostly made up of editors from the paper, really doesn't interview these candidates for stories.

We always wind up with these opinions about them because we know them on the side and from classes or what they do in Student Senate.

We're aware of what these candidates are doing and other than Student Senate itself, I'd say the people at the Collegian have the best idea of what is actually going on in Student Senate and what kind of people are well-suited for it and who are not.

Russell: How well do you think endorsing candidates in a two-party election year will work? Could it work against you?

Mike: The reason I'm doing it is because of the feedback I've gotten in the past.

People have said they've read the voter's guide, but it's all just exactly what the candidates wanted to say and the stories didn't tell them enough. We agree with that.

It's something newspapers do all over the country. We do it in city elections. We want people to vote the way we say, but it's not like we want to control what is going on in Senate. We'd like to stay out of Senate's way.

We're more interested in making sure the people who are there are honest, hard-working people who will do the job.

Russell: The only criticism I've heard stems from endorsing Board of Student Publications candidates. How can you qualify Student Publications employees endorsing members of the board that oversees them?

Mike: I have a lot of problems with the way the board is set up, anyway. Who knows more about what the Collegian needs than the Collegian?

They won't let us on the board, so we might as well tell the student body who we think will be a decent group of people to understand and help us with our needs.

One of the only requirements right now to be on the board is one, to be a student, and two, have nothing to do with Student Publications Inc. therefore entirely ignorant of Student Pub and the issues around it.

Except for people who are disgruntled with the Collegian, the only people who have anything against us are student government-type people.

Russell: What's the Collegian's reputation on campus? Does the Collegian get the respect it deserves?

Mike: There's a whole lot of people who take it for granted and see it as a paper that needs a whole lot of improvement. What a lot of people don't realize is that most of the people who write for the Collegian are writing for it for the first time. Every semester it starts over.

I hear a lot of complaints, but at the same time I hear a lot of compliments, and we win a lot of awards.

It's gratifying anytime I hear someone say, "You're the editor of the Collegian? Cool. Neat." They think that's a neat thing to be, and I get a little bit of a kick out of it. Obviously, they think it's important. Me? I'm just doing it for the experience.

Russell: There's a rumor that you've been keeping stories about squirrels out of the paper. How true is this?

Mike: Any responsible editor would step up and stop that nonsense. You've got to leave the squirrels alone.

They live on campus, and they are amongst us all the time, and I've got reporters out there badgering them — not letting up and relentlessly covering them. That paints an ugly media picture, and I can't have a paper run like that.

It's time again for reader requests. This is where I highlight some of the best home pages that have been sent in to me. These pages were previewed using Netscape.

Cliff Schaffer's Home Page

This is the place to go if you are interested in drugs. It matters not which drug — he has links to coke, marijuana, LSD and even alcohol. The entire page is a term paper looking to be written. It has the history of drugs and the war on drugs, dating back to ancient Carthage. It also tells of the first DUI in history.

Nearly every significant study on drugs is either listed here or linked. It has also included graphics of drug-war statistics that are made to be printed out for reports. The best part of this page is that the information it presents is not just for one side of the drug war debate. There are also links to D.A.R.E. and a huge section dedicated to the documents our government has produced on the war on drugs.

European links are also here, and the list of all the links provided on this page could easily fill a newspaper page — it is that impressive.

KSU Department of Kinesiology

(<http://www.ksu.edu/~kines/>)

This is one of the better departmental homepages I have seen on campus. If you thought Kinesiology is just P.E., this is a place to stop.

The department has included the typical departmental stuff that surfers expect (faculty, courses, programs, etc.). But it has expanded on the basic and added on some useful areas.

The heart-disease section is more than complete, and I dare you to find a link not listed here. The only complaint I have of this section is that it is too complete, so users are almost overwhelmed by the information.

The Fig Bar Man Presidential Campaign

(<http://www.epix.net/~wayne26/mrfigb/figbar.html>)

With the primary season through, Clinton and Dole are gearing up for a clash of Titans. One worry of some political experts is the continued voter dissatisfaction with both candidates. They believe a strong third party candidate who is not Ross Perot would have a chance for the White House.

That candidate's name is Fig Bar Man, and he has entered the race. Fig Bar Man has no illusions of the difficulties facing his campaign. He is looking for volunteers and will bribe. Get dubs on the office of your choice by helping Fig Bar Man win.

Besides having a much cooler name than the other candidates, Fig Bar Man wants to win at all costs. He will promise anything the voters want to hear. (Just like the other politicians.)

Most importantly, Fig Bar Man needs a vice-presidential candidate, and he is searching the Internet to find the right person for the job. Do you think you can handle Dan Quayle's old job? If so send in your application. If you are just a lurker, Fig Bar Man provides an account of the campaign trail. Vote Fig Bar Man!

about our outward appearances don't need to vote," he said.

"We're not conventional candidates, but we represent some pretty old-fashioned values."

Issues in the Horsefeathers-McCracken platform include paying more attention to student body concerns.

"Probably the most overriding concern Zeke and I have is the student referendum. Twice it has failed to meet the requirements," Baze said.

"I mean just looking at that, the student's desires are not being met."

Rafferty pointed out the recently defeated Lafene Health Center issue.

"With issues like Lafene, we have to ask whether the senators are doing what the constituents want," he said.

"It seems like the senators don't know what they're doing."

Baze and Rafferty have established a plan that they said will help maintain student involvement in student government.

"We will make sure those are met by using some very simple, non-bureaucratic methods," Baze said.

"We plan on heading over to the dorms and allowing them to voice their concerns. We will charge the Senate with addressing those concerns," he said.

Baze also said while he and Rafferty ty will remain Horsefeathers and McCracken, both in name and appearance, even after they are elected, they will also remain real students.

"We're traditional students with part-time jobs and heavy course work. I would wager that we are more in touch with the student body than the other candidates," Baze said.

and Pakistani students as well as a group of children from Bangladesh.

"We are trying to get different groups that haven't normally performed to participate in this year's International Nite," Kazi said.

The night's activities are a part of a week-long celebration titled "Colorful Reflections."

This theme was used because the idea includes American students as well as students from Latin America, Europe, Asia and Africa, Kazi said.

"Each one of us reflects a little bit of our culture to add to the K-State culture," she said.

Activities have been scheduled to take place in the Union Courtyard throughout the week, including an international fashion show, an exhibit and silent auction of international handicrafts and an African drum performance. Films with English subtitles from China, Africa, Spain and India will also be showing in the Union throughout the week.

International Week is about awareness, education and celebration of the rich cultures represented at K-State, Kazi said.

"This is a wonderful opportunity for people in the Manhattan and K-State communities," she said. "I hope they go to an event that they might not normally attend, because I think it will be an eye-opening and enjoyable experience."

Because this is the first year that International Nite has occurred on campus, attendance is expected to increase, she said. In the past the event took place off campus because of regulations related to preparing and serving the dinner using Union facilities.

"This year we are working together with Union Food Services," Kazi said. "It's something new, and we hope it works."

Tickets to attend International Nite are $5 and can be purchased at the International Student Center or at the International Week informational table in the K-State Student Union.

Board needs student input

Chris Oakley
staff writer

As elections draw near, students will be running for four positions available on the Board of Student Publications Inc.

The board consists of five students elected by the student body and three faculty members. Two are appointed by the University president, and one is the director of the A. Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications.

The Board oversees the publication of the Royal Purple, Collegian and the campus phone book.

"Student Publications has three main functions, in my opinion," said Ben Clouse, finance committee chairman of the board.

"First, it sets the budget for the year. Second, it hires editors and advertising managers. The third is to oversee the general operation and policy issues which may come up through the year," he said.

Clouse said the position requires a large commitment from students.

He said committee members need to have the ability to gauge the pulse of student life and be broad-based thinkers with the ability to see a wide range of opinions.

"I think most importantly, they need to have a desire to improve and further the mission of Student Publications. I see that mission as to improve the information needs of students through the paper, yearbook and phonebook," he said.

Aaron Otto, Student Publications committee chairman, said Committee members need to be able to listen to diverse opinions.

Smokes for sale

■ Union resumes tobacco sales, smoking still prohibited

Laurel Howell
staff writer

Tobacco products have returned to the K-State Student Union.

The Union Governing Board decided March 7 to accept the recommendation of an ad-hoc committee to allow the Union to begin selling tobacco products, said Barbara Pretzer, administrative assistant to the Union director.

The committee considered both the use and sale of tobacco products; however, because of the cost of creating a smoking area, it was not a part of the committee's recommendation, said Pat Carney, UGB member and senior in political science.

The Union has not sold tobacco products since a policy change in 1991, which banned the use and sale of tobacco products in the Union.

Tobacco sales represented 25 percent of sales at the information counter, Cissie Cooper, information counter supervisor, said.

When the policy was changed, the board thought banning use and not the sale of tobacco was hypocritical, said Jack Sills, senior associate director of the Union.

But now many places sell tobacco and do not allow its use, he said.

"There were a number of members who felt the use and sale of tobacco were separate issues," Sills said.

Carney said the issue of tobacco sales arose during the consideration of cereal malt beverage sales.

Bernard Pitts, Union director, asked that the sale and use of tobacco be studied to determine if it will affect Union renovation plans, Carney said.

The actual sale of tobacco will resume after the state issues the Union a tobacco sale license. Carney said tobacco will be on sale again before the end of the summer.

■ Students debate morality of public smoking, tobacco sales

Once upon a time, smoking was glamorous and a personal preference. Now public smoking has become a political and controversial issue, sparking a re-occurring debate on campus as the tug-of-war shifts, this time in smokers' favor.

Many students' support of the new policy of selling tobacco in the K-State Student Union is based on the idea that smoking has no business being a political issue.

"I think everybody's old enough to make their own decisions as far as health is concerned, and it isn't up to the Union or student government to make moral decisions for students," said Vickie Clements, junior in family studies and human services and labor relations.

"I don't feel like the Union, by selling tobacco, would be promoting the habit," she said. "I think it's similar to the decision to sell alcohol. A lot of the same principles are involved."

Beyond selling tobacco products, some students feel the policy doesn't go far enough.

"I think our American government doesn't like smokers," Kim Kyoung Yong, freshman undecided, said. "It is really not fair to have to go outside into the cold. I want a smoking area in the Union."

Other non-smokers are sympathetic to smokers for the inaccessibility of tobacco products as well as the lack of a comfortable area to accommodate them.

"I think they should have a smoking section," Jennifer Bame, senior in English, said. "It isn't fair that smokers should be standing out in the cold in the winter time, and that's coming from a non-smoker."

LOOK FOR THE VOTER'S GUIDE IN MONDAY'S COLLEGIAN

Candidates want student opinions

■ LeDoux campaign hinges on serving students, communicating

Scott M. Ladd
staff reporter

His past is an open book, and he urges voters to take a peek.

For Trent LeDoux, senior in animal science, his past two years as a senator have prepared him for his run for student body president.

"I have had a lot of people say I should consider running, and some of the positions I've taken over the past couple of years have shown that I've been fighting for the students," LeDoux said.

"One compliment I constantly received is that I'm up front with them," he said.

LeDoux, who will share the ticket with Brent Wiedeman, senior in agriculture education, said through the past few years he has not shifted his position when it came to voting for the students.

"I have cast way over 1,000 votes in the past two terms, and I have kept track of how I have voted. The students can feel free to contact me and find out how I have voted, and many times it has been for what they wanted," LeDoux said.

LeDoux said the cornerstone of their campaign will revolve around giving students more input.

"Our number one objective is serving the students," Wiedeman said. "(Students) are here for an education, and if they are priced out of an education, they're not going to be here."

LeDoux echoed concerns.

"We think (issues) should be voted on by referendum," LeDoux said. "When they pick up the Collegian and see the vote, they begin to realize that they didn't get allowed into the process."

"On issues like the Lafene increase, what you had was Student Senate saying they didn't want student input on the issue," he said.

"We want to change that — we want to put the student back into student government. The students want control, and we're going to get it."

Another issue LeDoux and Wiedeman want to address during their campaign involves getting lines of communication opened between senators and their constituents.

"We admit that we don't have all the answers, and that's why we want their input," LeDoux said.

LeDoux, who established a Senate newsletter that he sent to his constituents via e-mail, said students can always contact them.

"When students come to the Big 8 Room, they often feel like they are invading the clubhouse," LeDoux said. "That's not how we operate."

"We want students to realize that they have a choice," he said. "Whether it is teacher evaluations or paying for fees, students don't just have to settle for the status quo. They can change it."

Ticket talk
This is the second in a series of stories about president and vice president tickets.
Today: Trent LeDoux and Brent Wiedeman. Still to come: Chris Hansen and Aaron Otto, and Shane Cowan and Brian Rader.

Trent LeDoux, senior in animal science, left, and Brent Wiedeman, senior in agriculture education, will rely on their past records when they run for student body president and vice president, respectively.

► CITY COMMISSION

Commissioner replaces mayor at end of term

■ Carlin steps in as mayor of Manhattan beginning April 16, wants to continue current progress

Chris Oakley
staff writer

Beginning April 16, Commissioner Sydney Carlin will be known as Mayor Carlin. Tuesday night city commissioners voted 5-0 to select Carlin to replace Edith Stunkel, whose term ends.

Carlin will serve a one-year term.

Carlin said she will give a speech concerning her goals as mayor at the session.

"Truly the mayor's position is a figurehead. I'll be presiding over meetings and giving a lot of welcoming speeches and enlisting the other commissioners to go out in front of the public as much as I can," she said.

Carlin said she wants to continue some of the progress made by the commission into her term.

"We've been working on goal-setting together as a commission, and that gives us a good start," she said.

"We've worked really well as a team over the last year. It's been a very hard year, but we've pulled together when we needed to. I look forward to working with the commission in that way," Carlin said.

Stunkel said she has sent Carlin a memo with suggestions concerning her new position.

"It was in response to the fact that when I became mayor, I had no idea what I was getting into. I had sort of watched previous mayors and learned by osmosis," Stunkel said.

"I put down those kind of things which I wish I had known when I was selected to the position," she said.

Stunkel said part of the difficulties of being mayor were staying on top of minor administrative duties that come with the job.

Traditionally, commissioners have chosen a mayor the second meeting of April. However, Commissioner Bruce Snead is unable to attend the April 16 meeting, so elections were moved.

"The ceremonial passing of the baton will be next legislative session," Stunkel said.

The commission also elected Snead to serve a one-year term as mayor pro tem.

► CITY COUNCIL VOTES NOT TO OPPOSE PREGNANCY CENTER LOCALE

WICHITA, (AP) — Wichita City Council members voted Tuesday to end their opposition to locating a pregnancy counseling center next door to an abortion clinic where a doctor was wounded by gunfire in 1993.

The council voted 4-3 to drop its court appeal of a ruling in a lawsuit involving a non-profit group called Serving Women in Crisis Inc., whose membership includes those who have been abortion clinic demonstrators.

Councilman Greg Ferris said the matter should have been a zoning case that excluded the abortion issue.

He voted in favor of dropping the appeal.

"This was a bad case from the very first because purely from a zoning standpoint we had very little to go on," he said.

Councilwoman Joan Cole voted against discontinuing the appeal.

"I'm disappointed ... I see it not as a settlement, but as a capitulation for reasons that give short shrift to the wishes of the neighborhood," she said.

SWC owns a house next to Dr. George Tiller's clinic in east Wichita. It requested a zoning change to permit the counseling center, but the city has opposed the move.

The group appealed the case to Sedgewick County District Court, where Judge Karl Friedel sided with SWC and criticized city officials for assuming there would be trouble.

The City Council appealed the judge's ruling, blocking SWC from moving forward with its plan.

Tiller was shot in both arms in an attack in 1993. Shelly Shannon, 39, of Grants Pass, Ore., is serving more than 10 years in prison for the crime.

There were massive protests and hundreds of arrests at Tiller's clinic in 1991 during Operation Rescue's "Summer of Mercy."

Clinic officials said the proposed center is a security threat.

"We will continue to provide the best security to our patients, our staff and our physicians as is humanly possible for us to do," Peggy Jarman, a Tiller spokeswoman said.

► MILITIA MAN WANTS TO HELP FBI NEGOTIATE IN FREEMEN STANDOFF

JORDAN, Mont. (AP) — Don Vos, a self-described two-star general in the Ohio Militia, said he can do what more than 100 federal agents so far have not — persuade the Freemen to surrender.

If only the government would let him try.

As the FBI's standoff with the defiant Freemen marks its ninth day, wannabe peacemakers keep arriving, uninvited and unwelcome, offering to save the day.

"I drove 27 hours from Ohio to see if I could be allowed to go in and negotiate," Vos said Monday

► GROUP RECOMMENDS LICENSING COMMUNITIES' TEACHER AIDES

WASHINGTON (AP) — The nation's 455,540 teacher aides often are regarded as just secretaries for teachers, but a teacher recruitment group said helping them become licensed instructors could ease future teacher shortages, especially in urban areas.

Seventy-seven percent of the more than 9,000 teacher aides studying to become professional teachers are minorities, according to a study released today. They typically live in the urban school districts in which they work, understand the culture of the community and can design strategies to reach these students, according to the study.

"Teacher aides need to be brought into the mainstream of school reform, instead of the margins," said David Haselkorn, president of Recruiting New Teachers

Inc., a national nonprofit organization in Belmont, Mass., that works to attract people to teaching careers.

The organization studied 150 programs in more than 30 states that teach aides to become teachers.

The programs typically include regular college and university work and field training, as well as summer and weekend courses leading to bachelor's and master's degrees.

► VACCINE WORKS IN RATS, TO BE TESTED ON HUMAN BRAIN CANCER

WASHINGTON (AP) — A cancer vaccine that repeatedly wiped out tumors in laboratory rats may be ready for testing against a vicious type of human brain cancer by this summer, researchers report.

In a study published today in the Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences, scientists at the University of California, Los Angeles, say their new vaccine removes a biological disguise that cancer cells use to hide from the immune system.

Habib Fakhrai, the lead author of the study, said the vaccine uses genetic engineering to alert the immunity system to the cancer and causes the body's defenses to attack the tumor.

Fakhrai said cancers of the brain, breast, lung, colon and prostate all suppress the immune system by secreting a substance called transforming growth factor-beta, or TGF-B.

INTERNATIONAL LECTURE

Russia needs help to stabilize

Tom Roesler
staff reporter

Russia and the rest of the world are heading into areas that have never been traveled before.

Russian academician Georgii Arbatov spoke to a crowd of 30-40 people in Union Forum Hall Tuesday about the status of the Russian government.

He said it would take a global effort to bring stability to Russia and the rest of the world.

"It's a matter of unique opportunity which opened up after the Cold War to change our relationship. The future will tell if we will take advantage or squander it," Arbatov said.

He said he felt there were many problems in Russia that will not take care of themselves. Many of these problems were started during the Cold War.

"All of the events that happened were due to the bad relations during the Cold War, and a lot of those problems were frozen during the Cold War," Arbatov said. "Now all of these problems have become unfrozen, and we have to deal with them."

Arbatov said he felt the world was not prepared for all these problems. He said an agenda was needed to provide a way to resolve these problems.

One of the biggest issues is how to get rid of what is left of the Cold War. "We need to take care of the mountains of weapons that cannot be used. They have the ability to spread, either sold, lost or stolen," Arbatov said.

Governments are slow to regulate their own weapons because they wait to see how other governments regulate theirs.

The defense industry also contributes to the slow process.

"In my country, it comprised of more than half of the economy. In your country, it was slightly less," Arbatov said.

Because there is so much money involved in the defense industry, it takes substantial investment to redistribute the money, which takes time and provides few success stories, Arbatov said.

Because Russia's economy is in such a poor state, Russia is no longer certain about its future in democracy.

Many Russian nationalists are pushing for communism again because they remember better times.

"Because they can remember that they had it better in the past, many people have started to turn toward communism again or other extremists," Arbatov said.

There were some ideas that Arbatov had to help relieve the problems in Russia and the rest of the world.

His first idea is that countries would deal with internal problems, such as weapons regulation.

Arbatov emphasized his second idea dealing with the Russian economy. Investments have fallen 85 percent during the past five years.

Every year there are fewer investments in the Russian economy, and production from the Russian economy goes down.

In order to remedy this problem, some Russian economists have come up with an idea of developing an international fund. Countries would contribute money to this fund which would guarantee investment in Russia.

The United States provides some guarantees in the Russian economy but not enough, he said. With this international fund, $30-40 billion would be provided for investments. Arbatov pointed out that this was not a demand but just an idea.

"Of course, we still have not lost. I hope, all opportunities, and we can still make use of them," Arbatov said.

Arbatov concluded by saying ideas and agendas are needed to lead us down a new path in history.

"We have to understand we are entering an area never reached before," Arbatov said.

"It's like the proverb 'Traveler, don't look for the ways. The ways are made by walking.'"

CRIMINAL JUSTICE

Child molester could be released

Associated Press

HUNTSVILLE, Texas (AP) — The release of a child molester who warned he is doomed to strike again — and this time, kill — was delayed Tuesday as authorities considered whether the threat is enough to keep him behind bars.

Larry Don McQuay, 32, was about two hours away from being released from prison to a halfway house when Victor Rodriguez, chairman of the Texas Board of Pardons and Paroles, stepped in.

McQuay, who earned an early release with good behavior, "allegedly has made comments that can be considered threatening to individuals and the public at large," said David Nunnelee, a Criminal Justice Department spokesman.

"If he has ... they can penalize him for that."

He could be stripped of the "good time" credits he earned.

Rodriguez said that he would interview McQuay and that a review of the case probably would take a couple of days.

McQuay has served six years of an eight-year sentence for molesting a 6-year-old boy in San Antonio.

He claims to have molested more than 200 youngsters.

While in prison, McQuay exchanged letters — sometimes signed "child molesting demon" — with a victims rights group in which he warned he would do even more harm to children if he were released.

"I am doomed to eventually rape, then murder, my poor little victims to keep them from telling on me," he said in a message to Justice For All, based in Houston.

McQuay sent the organization at least six such notes over the past year or so, and parole officials requested copies on Tuesday, said Dianne Clements, president of the group.

She described the letters as "perverse and sick stuff" and a "dissertation of his fantasies."

"I think it's very wise for prison officials and the parole board to look at his eligibility," Clements said.

"Of course, it's only temporary. But at least children are safe for at least 24 hours."

While in prison, McQuay campaigned unsuccessfully to be castrated. State officials denied the request because it was considered elective surgery.

A move by the Legislature to allow such operations failed last year.

"I have been busting my butt to do everything possible to keep me from reoffending, but everyone seems to be dead set against that," McQuay said at the time.

"I got away with molesting over 240 children before getting caught for molesting just one little boy. With all that I have cold-heartedly learned while in prison, there is no way that I will ever be caught again.

"Will your children be my next victims?"

In August, McQuay described himself to the weekly Houston Press as "a child molester. A monster."

"Sometimes I wish I was born a 100 years ago when you could marry a 12-year-old girl and nobody would think twice about it. Or back in the Greek culture when they had sex with boys," he said.

"But in today's society that's not acceptable, and I'm not a time traveler, so I can't go back into another society or another culture."

A 1995 state law requires local law enforcement authorities be notified if a convicted child molester is moving into the community.

But McQuay would not be subject to the law because he was convicted before the measure was enacted.

He was to have been released at midday, with a $50 check, a bus ticket out of town and the promise of another $50 for reporting — on his own — to Texas House in Houston, where he would serve the remainder of his sentence.

"It terrifies me," said Betty Frank, who lives near the 210-inmate halfway house and spent Monday writing a petition protesting the number of sex offenders sent there.

She said she worries when her 3- and 5-year-old children play outside.

INTERNATIONAL STUDENT CENTER

Committee plans fund raisers to benefit international center

Jessica White
staff reporter

The expansion of the International Student Center was the topic of guest speakers at the Vernon Larson International Luncheon Tuesday.

Ruth Ann Wefald and Bob Kruh, co-chairpersons of the International Student Center fund-raising committee, spoke about the need for more space in the International Student Center.

The center's fund-raising committee is currently trying to raise money to expand the center.

"Our goal is to raise $250,000 to create private counseling space, a conference room and possibly a children's center as well," Wefald said.

Wefald said plans for expansion are flexible and may take the shape of a one-level addition to the south.

The center was built in 1977 to accommodate the needs of about 600 international students who were attending K-State at that time. Right now, there are about 1,100 international students attending K-State, and the size of the International Student Center has remained the same.

"It is extremely crowded," Wefald said. "Private counseling and some of the things that need to go on in private have to take place in rather public places, and it's not a desirable situation at all."

Some of the services the Center offers are counseling, visa arrangements, family assistance and orientation.

"Over the past three years, we have had an increase in services provided," Kruh said. "A lot of these services are confidential, and there is just not enough space to meet student needs."

Kruh said having international students benefits residents of Manhattan because people can experience international cultures without leaving Manhattan. He said students who have an international awareness are able to expand their career possibilities.

MAGIC CARPET

A Magic Carpet Extravaganza will be from 10 a.m. to 5:30 p.m. Thursday at the Ramada Inn. The carpets will be from Apodana Oriental Rug Gallery Inc., a company in Wichita, and 30 percent of the gross will go toward the International Student Center expansion.

study in the United States also creates jobs for Americans and brings in money from other countries, Kruh said. Current fund-raising activities include a silent auction, a piano concert given by concert artist Lucille Chung and a Magic Carpet Extravaganza carpet sale.

The silent auction will take place in the K-State Student Union Courtyard Thursday.

Objects from other countries have been donated from faculty, international students and some community members.

If there's a market, sell tobacco in Union

QUICK read

► As long as selling tobacco remains a service to students, it should be sold in the K-State Student Union. But we feel it's too bad well educated people continue to provide a market.

So, the K-State Student Union is going to start selling tobacco again?

How sad.

Not sad that the Union wants to sell it. Who are we to begrudge the Union's need to make money while providing services to students?

What is sad is there are still students who want the Union to provide this service in the first place. It is sad that intelligent, reasonable and informed people are under the sway of one of the most addictive substances known — nicotine.

Wouldn't it be nice if there were no profit to be made selling tobacco products? Then this issue would not even have come up. Whether tobacco was sold in the Union, or even made illegal, would be irrelevant if there were no market for the product in the first place.

But let's be realistic. A sizable number of individuals at K-State smoke or chew.

Those people are going to be using their drug whether the Union sells it or not.

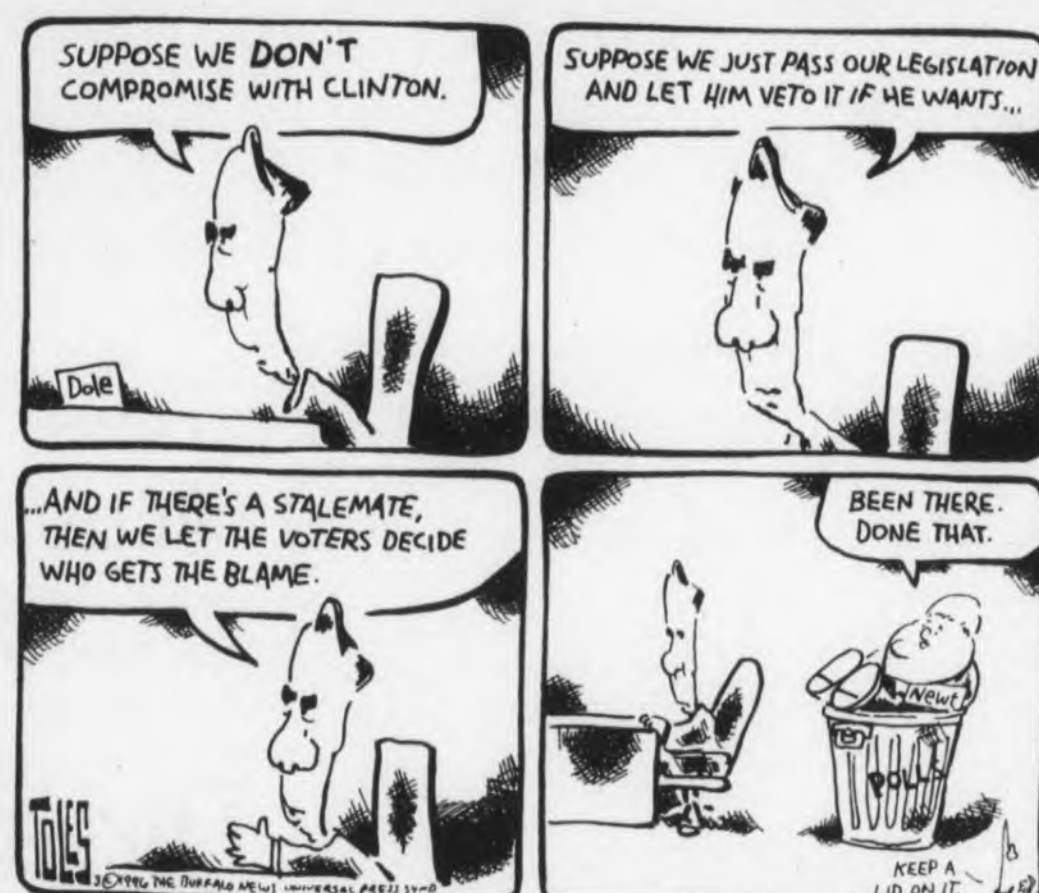

And tobacco sales in the Union is a service many students want. As with any service, as long as it is legal, and within the Union's power to provide, then by all means, the Union should provide that service. As long as there are students to support the service, it should stay. When there are no longer large numbers of students who want to support it, it will go.

After all, if the Union does not sell the tobacco, the students are just going to go off campus to buy it. Better that money be kept on campus and used to support the Union.

We just wish there were not any students who wanted to smoke or chew in the first place.

So let the Union sell the tobacco. As long as the tobacco use is prohibited within the Union, we do not mind.

PRESIDENT

HIRIAM
Horsefeathers

VICE PRESIDENT

EZEKIEL
McCracken

Common sense needed

Ole Zeke McCracken and I sure have seen a few changes in our day. Why, we've seen the advent of picture-radio, horseless carriages running through the streets and even the young ladies wearing jelly shoes.

But, the more things change, the more they stay the same. That is as true in the Student Governing Association today, as it was when we put our toil and sweat into the Rutherford B. Hayes campaign so many years ago.

Here is our take on things, and we think you will agree: Students are not well represented in student government at K-State.

When was the last time your senators, or your student body president, sought out your opinions, or your friends' opinions, before they made a decision about how they would spend your money?

We are not saying it is their duty to always seek you out — democracy demands that people stay involved in their governments. However, we do assert that when people accept positions where they will represent you, they have a responsibility to represent your opinion in their votes.

And that is not happening.

If you do not believe us, consider the student referendum concerning the privatization of the Union. Twice the students of K-State voted against this plan. Twice it failed to meet the majority vote it supposedly "required." Yet K-State administration and Union officials went ahead with a plan the students do not want. But we still get to pay for it.

There is obviously a chasm between student desires and University action. The Horsefeathers/McCracken ticket hopes to bridge this gap by staying in touch with our fellow students.

How difficult is it to take one evening a month to go over to the Derby complex and hear questions and concerns from students who demand accountability from their government? How difficult can it be for the leaders to make themselves available to the students reasonably often? Horsefeathers and McCracken say it is not that hard.

So why is it not being done? It is high time for students to begin questioning those who are supposed to be defending their best interests. By putting the "Vern" back in "government," we are returning the common person's role to its rightful place. SGA is your government — you dictate its actions. Unfortunately, this does not seem to be the case.

We may be strangers to the inner sanctum of the student government, but this does not make us unqualified for the posts. We have both had experience in political workings before, and we know the best policy for an administration to follow is one that uses common sense as its guiding principle.

When the athletic department wanted to double the athletic fee so that it could take care of business that it had delayed until the last minute, Student Senate should not have spent hours debating over it.

Rather, we should have looked them right in the eye and said, "No. You will not place your burdens upon the backs of the students. You have made your bed and now you shall lie in it." It is only common sense, really.

And common sense dictates that we should keep our students healthy. We promise to keep the Lafene Health Center in the best shape we can — after all, if the students are ill, they deserve a place where they can go for quality health care, not like the apothecary that Zeke had to visit when he got the mumps.

Common sense also dictates the student population be kept well informed of the events that directly affect it. Because of this need for news, we promise to support the Collegian and other student publications and help make them the finest in the land. And, in order to ensure your good humor, we will establish a committee to find out if "Doog and Blair" ever makes sense.

SGA under Horsefeathers and McCracken will be an open house, available for all students to come and air their complaints, their concerns and their needs. We pledge to you now: if we do not make the student government truly the government of the students, we will resign our posts and retire from politics to farm watermelons in northern Idaho.

Some might think our odd ways and strange manner of campaigning are signs that we are taking this as a joke. Nothing could be farther from the truth. Horsefeathers and McCracken are the real deal forged in the fires of American politics and honed to a sharp edge on the grinding wheel of the campaign trail. We are ready for the job, and we will accept the challenge.

Make your voice heard when you cast your ballot, and take back the government from those who have kept it from you for so long.

Joshua Baze (appearing on the ballot as Hiram H. Horsefeathers) is a junior in advertising. Colin Rafferty (appearing on the ballot as Ezekiel McCracken) is a sophomore in English.

Okinawan presence should be questioned

Throughout middle school and high school, we all learned about the American Revolution and the struggle to break away from England, a country with a tyrannical monarchy that was strangling the colonies. We took vocabulary tests that asked us who the Minutemen were. We came to see the Boston Tea Party as a great symbolic act, and Paul Revere's ride was taught to us by way of a poem.

In the two centuries since our independence, America's diplomatic arm has flexed time and time again to bring democracy to small countries, as seen in the Taiwanese elections. American forces fought in an alliance against Hitler in World War II and started a land war in Asia to stop the Domino Effect. All in all, most Americans look at their country as a titan protecting the smaller kids on the block.

This image, though, has changed with the latest situation in Okinawa. I am not referring to the rape of a 12-year-old girl by servicemen, although that was, without a doubt, a terrible event in our presence there. The rape was an element that brought the current situation to a boil.

Okinawans are tired of the U.S. military having a base on their island. On Sunday, 90,000 people gathered in of the world. We have the world's strongest military. The Japanese need us, and we need their base in Okinawa.

However, that also means that we are crushing the toes of the very people we are supposed to be protecting. It is not justifiable to sit by watching the Okinawan peoples' civil rights abused while we encourage democracy and freedom in Taiwan.

We accuse China of intimidating a free people with missiles, yet we are doing the same thing with words.

The Japanese have long been accused of ignoring the needs of the Okinawan people. As we have seen throughout history, Japan is a nation whose set of beliefs demand support and obedience of authority; this respect is something which is not earned, but given by the people. By their action of protest last Sunday, the Okinawan people have shown they are tired of bowing.

It is a familiar situation in our global community: a small country, weaker than its parent, trying to break away. Japan is the direct controlling element in this situation.

However, America holds a good deal of influence over Japan. It is ironic that the supposed greatest champion of democracy is denying a people its wish of being left alone.

Maybe we have not learned the true lesson from our history books after all.

The owner of the land, Shoichi Chibana, said "We've kept our heads down long enough. Now it's time to do something about our land."

In the end, though, he has little to say about the matter. The United States handed Okinawa to the Japanese in 1972 as part of the Japan-U.S. Security Treaty. Consequently, the Japanese government might override Chibana's wishes due to articles in the treaty which make provisions for U.S. facilities in Japan and its holdings.

With China's latest military activity in the region, it is evident that our military muscle is still needed in that corner

Not because they are good candidates or have a strong grasp of the issues. Nor are these particularly bad candidates with a poor grasp of the issues.

These candidates have a poor grasp of deadlines, and that is the only thing you need know about them.

For several years, the Student Governing Association has had a hard time dealing with people who violate elections guidelines. Candidates had their names stricken from the ballot only to be reinstated. Elections have been invalidated and held again.

It has been chaos. Last year was different. Votes were counted and candidates inaugurated with little trouble. Too little trouble.

Among the people put in office were several who had failed to meet one or more of the guidelines established by the elections committee.

They failed to attend mandatory meetings. They forgot to turn in expenditure reports, and their dogs ate their homework.

Most had excuses. Some even had good excuses.

But the excuses were never heard because the elections committee decided to stop listening. They chose instead to give the names to the Collegian, assuming voters would make rational, informed decisions.

Perhaps the voters did. Who is to say? But the voters, informed or not, still elected people who had not followed the rules.

There is little that can be done. Senate accepted the winners provided by the elections committee, and the deed was done.

I want to urge you not to vote for anyone who has missed a deadline or forgotten to file. The rules are put there for a reason, and failure to have any meaningful consequences for violating the rules makes no sense.

Do not vote for Sam Limo or Jeff

Penrose (Union Governing Board); Sam Limo or Mark Tomb (Board of Student Publications); Jason Bell (arts and sciences senator); Sam Limo (business senator); Trevor A. Dennis (education senator); Majed Khan (graduate senator); Katie Kimble or Josh Blecker (arts and sciences council); Jodi Honeman or Laura Clouse (human ecology council); T. J. Rose (education council); Sam Limo, Ben Retter or Jeff Anderson (business council); or Brian Riedel (engineering council secretary).

It is not that I have anything against these students. Some are friends and colleagues of mine.

But if we as a student body consistently ignore the infractions of our candidates, what will keep us from ignoring the infractions of our elected officials? By allowing candidates who violate the rules to take office, we only set ourselves up for bad government.

As a final note, I encourage you to continue to read the Collegian. As more deadlines approach, you will find more people in violation.

With all those names on the ballot, weeding out those in violation will make it so much easier to vote.

Dan Lewerenz is a senior in philosophy and American ethnic studies.

TEACHER EVALUATIONS SHOULDN'T BE PUBLIC

Editor,
So the issue of publishing teacher evaluations is being resurrected. As both a teacher (undergraduate sociology) and a student (doctoral program), I think I have a unique perspective.

What is the obsession with this? Would students use the evaluation results to select a certain course and teacher believing that high ratings correlate to easy? When I was an undergraduate, word of mouth and the grapevine were usually the methods used to select professors. I know it happens here, too.

Teacher evaluations are part of personnel records and should remain confidential, same as student records. I do put some trust and faith in the system allowing respective academic departments to evaluate teachers with the ratings only being one aspect. If students have a problem with an instructor, they should talk to the person or go to the chair or dean. One of the Collegian's front-page articles described how some student did just that. I try to always be accessible to my students and place my home phone number on the syllabus in the event of any questions or problems.

If teacher evaluations are to be published, it would only be fair to post the names (not social security numbers) of the students next to the instructor ratings with the student's class attendance record, test scores, term paper ratings, etc. along with the rating they gave the teacher.

Students are smart enough to make their own comparisons and conclusions. I had one student who complained about an instructor in another department though she received an A. I think the teacher sensed the displeasure of the students and cleverly did not hand out evaluation forms at the end of the semester. If someone receives a C, D or F in a course, do a self-assessment of your effort and motivation in class before blaming the teacher.

There are people who should not be teachers and likewise, there are people who should not be students. An editorial on this subject said teacher ratings should be published in the line schedule. Likewise, the courses and grades a student received in the past should be published on instructors' student rosters at the beginning of the semester so the instructors could decide if they want the student in class.

Let's look at this from another direction. Since administrators manage the University paid for by our taxes, why not ask that their annual evaluations be published and posted outside of their offices? How about posting ratings by supervisors of every student who works on campus? Again, our tax dollars are paying for their employment. How long do you think the following scenarios would be able to persist?

Administrator rating: George mis-spent $50,000 illegally last year, but he was ingenious in the way he did it. Recommend a promotion for creativity.

Student Food Service Worker Evaluation: Amy picks her nose and sneezes while preparing food, but she makes the best chunky chili. Recommend a pay raise.

America now, they would hop right back on a boat and head to England. They would be outraged at the ignorance of people who throw away the freedom that they so valiantly fought for. What has happened to the passion for freedom? Are Americans so foolish that they will throw it away? It appears so.

Today is a day of passing the buck. Criminals blame their society, wayward teens blame their parents, and if anything else goes wrong, then just blame the government. Statistics show that a shocking number of Americans are murdered each year by handguns, and so of course, America has a gun problem. Right?

Wrong. There is not a gun problem. There is a people problem. It is naive to think guns are really responsible for those deaths. People are responsible for those deaths. A gun is no more responsible for the poor choices of the user than a car is for being misused by a drunk driver.

The problem lies much deeper than a gun-control issue. The healing of a nation will not take place in the political forum, but in the individual lives of its citizens. God promises in 2 Chronicles 7:14 "If my people, who are called by my name, will humble themselves and pray and seek my face and turn from their wicked ways, then will I hear from heaven and will forgive their sin and will heal their land."

America needs God. Children are killing children? Take away one weapon, and they will find a new one. Give them a hope, give them a reason and they will seek a better solution. Take away their future of freedom, and they learn nothing. God is not about shifting the blame, but he is about real life changes. God sent Jesus Christ so that "they may have life, and have it to the full" (John 10:10) There is no need to continue to live life defeated, but God has given us his son so that we can live abundantly.

Do not throw away the precious gift of freedom. It will not solve the problem. A person can bail water out of a sinking ship forever, but until the hole is fixed, they will still be sinking. God, and God alone, is the only hope for a sinking nation.

• Did you know?

■ K-State's first major league baseball player was pitcher Eldon Auker. He pitched with the Tigers, Red Sox, and St. Louis Browns and played in two World Series with the Tigers, including the seventh game of the 1934 Series against the St. Louis Cardinals Gas House Gang.

■ Starting Thursday, the Collegian will begin a seven-part series on the Wildcats in spring football. Part one will focus on the quarterback crew, led by Monday Bowl hero Brian Kavanagh.

Taking the ROAD LESS TRAVELLED

For the first time in school history, K-State has a cycling club. Like the roads the members travel, the journey has been at times rocky. But they just keep on riding.

Shana Newell
sports editor

When a friend of Bill Marshall's began a cycling club at KU, Marshall decided it was time for a club at K-State. Since the start of the club last semester, around 30 members have joined, including two females, Marshall said. Starting the club hasn't been easy. In fact, it's been downright difficult. "We don't have any money," Marshall said. "None."

That's bad news for a team that needs money to compete. So what is the team going to do about its financial problems?

"We're having a meeting next week to discuss exactly that," Marshall said. "We want to sponsor a race here in town."

The club has two factions — a mountain bike racing group and a road racing group. To make money, Marshall said the best bet would be to be host to a mountain bike race.

"We could make a lot of money off that," he said.

"We could make a lot off the entry fees alone."

Right now, the only source of income for the club is donations.

And although there is some reimbursement, race contestants must pay their own entry fees.

The club has raced in only two events so far this season, but will take to the roads again on April 13 and 14 in Ames, Iowa.

The Iowa State cycling club will sponsor the event.

The race will be a closed circuit lap race.

If you would like more information about K-State's Cycling Club, contact Bill Marshall at 776-8614. Anyone is welcome to join the team.

Drug charges knock Irvin off super-star pedestal

For the past eight years, I have idolized him. Just recently, I have condemned him.

He is Michael Irvin. Irvin is the Dallas Cowboys' all-time leading receiver. Monday, he was indicted on two counts of drug possession.

If convicted, Irvin could possibly spend the next 20 years in blue prison garb, not the cherished blues and grays of the Cowboys.

For those of you who haven't been alive, or who just plain don't give a holler about America's Team, Irvin was found by police in a motel room on March 4 with two women and former teammate Alfredo Roberts.

They were caught with drugs (cocaine and marijuana) and drug paraphernalia. Irving police officers described the women as topless dancers.

After Irvin was indicted, he was arrested, then released on $5,500 bond. Only Irvin and the women were indicted, as of now. There was no decision on whether to indict Roberts, according to the Associated Press.

In a statement released by the NFL, according to the Associated Press, the organization will closely monitor the case.

"Players ultimately convicted of drug-related violations of law are subject to disciplinary action by the commissioner. Pending resolution of court cases, the NFL drug policy and program for drugs of abuse and alcohol states that players involved in drug-related incidents are required to undergo on a confidential basis a medical evaluation by independent doctors that could result in a mandatory treatment program," the NFL said.

If that happens, Irvin would also be subject to 10 drug tests per month for two years.

If he doesn't comply with any part of the policy, he would be fined and possibly even suspended.

According to news reports, at the time the officers found the group, one of the women claimed the drug paraphernalia and the drugs belonged to her. Irvin escaped arrest at that point.

In an article published this week in Sports Illustrated, an Irving police officer (one of four) who went to the motel room said they knocked repeatedly at the door and heard people moving around inside.

"When we did get the door (partially) open, they had the security bar on it. A big cloud of smoke came out," the officer said.

When the officers told who they were, it is reported a male voice inside the room asked, "Can I tell you who I am?"

It has also been reported that Irvin's fingerprints were found on various items in the room, including dinner plates on which drugs were found, and a glass container with cocaine residue was found in Irvin's overnight bag.

Irvin is the only Cowboy receiver to be selected to four Pro Bowls. He's been the NFL's pass receiving yardage leader over the past four years.

He's been one of my favorite all-time football players.

Now, even with all the talent and accolades and awards and Super Bowl rings, he's only a loser in my mind.

Wasn't there a comedian who once said cocaine is God's way of saying you have too much money?

Not only does the Cowboys organization pay Irvin a pretty penny to make plays (hence the nickname "Playmaker"), but Irvin rakes in a fair hunk of change from a line of clothing he created — the "Masterpeace Ragz" collection.

On top of that, look at what else Irvin does. He has his own TV show and his own radio show, and he does an almost ungodly amount of advertising.

Irvin is much like Michael Jordan, Deion Sanders or even Ken Griffey, Jr. He can be found everywhere through the wonderful (and I'm being facetious here) world of sensationalistic advertising.

Irvin has been sensationalized. He has been elevated to a level so high he's been considered by many to be almost godlike.

He must not have thought the pedestal he was on could ever fall down. Why else would he get involved in such stupid, idiotic activities?

No one takes a gun to your head and says take these drugs or else. (OK, maybe on a rare occasion that will happen, but do you really think some drug dealer held a gun to Irvin's head?)

He MUST have known he was doing something wrong.

For god's sake, he supposedly tried to talk the cops out of coming into the motel room.

What does this say to the millions of children who are growing up with Irvin as a hero much like I grew up with Roger Staubach or Danny White?

How could Irvin let his fans down like that? I don't know. But it won't happen again. Irvin has let this fan down once. I won't let him do it again. I hope the Cowboy's have enough good sense to do the same and release him from his contract.

I'm sorry, Michael, but your pedestal just crumbled to the ground.

► BASEBALL

Wildcats snap 13-game streak with split at WSU

Shana Newell
sports editor

WICHITA — Wichita State did it again. In the first game of a doubleheader Tuesday at Tyler Field, K-State fell to 17-10 on the season with a heartbreaking 10-9 loss to the Shockers.

It was not supposed to end that way. But costly errors on the basepaths by Wildcat runners continued Wichita State's now 13-game winning streak against the Cats.

"It's frustrating," Coach Mike Clark said. "Our kids competed hard, but we got a little sloppy on the basepaths."

A little sloppy is right. On five occasions, Cats were caught either stealing or leading off base.

"We're very evenly matched ball clubs," Clark said. "The difference in this game was that we made a couple mistakes baserunning."

K-State was led offensively by designated hitter David Hendrix. Hendrix tied a club record for home runs in a game with three. It was the second time in his career he hit three out of the park. The first was against Oklahoma in 1994. Hendrix has seven home runs on the season. For the game, Hendrix was 3-of-5 with four RBIs.

Also contributing to the Cats' output was shortstop Heath Schesser. Schesser went 4-of-5. He had his ninth double of the season and his third triple.

K-State led the game going into the bottom of the seventh inning 7-4, but a five-run rally by the Shockers stopped the Cats.

With two opportunities to win the game, K-State was unable to make it to home plate after second baseman Scott Poepard and third baseman Todd Fereday were caught stealing two in the end of the eighth inning for the Cats.

In the ninth, Hendrix led off with his third solo

IN THE NIGHTCAP

• K-State jumped out to an 8-1 advantage in the second game and held on for a 9-7 win. The Wildcats scored five runs in the bottom of the fourth inning. Scott Poepard and Todd Fereday led the Wildcats at the plate, each going three for five with two RBIs. Look for a game story in Thursday's Collegian.

► SPRING FOOTBALL

Loss of seniors, coaches focus for spring drills

Dan Lewerenz
contributing writer

Are you ready?
"I'm a big proponent of spring football."

I said are you ready?

"The changes we've made in the coaching staff have involved people who have a lot of experience with our program."

Football coach Bill Snyder is ready to rumble.

Basketball season is barely over, baseball season is not half done. But football is already on the way back.

Snyder held his first press conference of the spring Tuesday, announcing the beginning of the spring practice season.

The Wildcats will have 15 practices leading up to the spring exhibition game, tentatively set for April 27.

In the meantime, Snyder and the Wildcats will focus on several things — most importantly, replacing several senior leaders whose eyes now look to the NFL.

"Obviously when we have lost players due to the end of their eligibility, we have to replace these people," Snyder said.

"We really need this football team to come together as a team, so we need this to be a unifying type of practice."

The loss of co-defensive coordinators Bobby Stoops (now the defensive coordinator at Florida) and Jim Leavitt (coach at South Florida) will mean some changes in the defense.

But Mike Stoops will add to his duties as defensive ends coach and share defensive coordinator duties with Bob Cope, who served as defensive coordinator for Snyder in 1989 and 1990.

Linebackers coach Brent Venables will be in his first season as a full-time assistant coach, but was a graduate assistant for three years after a 1992 season that earned him all-Big 8's honorable mention accolades.

All three have extensive experience in Snyder's system.

"Nevertheless, it's important for them to be on the field together to gel as a unit," Snyder said.

One big question mark that still looms over next season is the status of quarterback Cody Lee Smith. While he has recovered from the stomach ailment that sidelined him last season, the NCAA has not yet decided whether or not they will grant him a medical hardship for last season.

Although he is listed as a junior in the Cats' spring prospectus, Smith will play as a senior and will learn after the season if he is granted an additional year of eligibility.

"The response of the NCAA is that we will have to resubmit our application for the medical hardship after he completes his eligibility this year," Snyder said.

We really need this football team to come together as a team, so we need this to be a unifying type of practice.

► BIOLOGY SEMINAR

Speaker promotes teaching method

Abdullnaser T. Abdullah
staff reporter

Using an inquiry method of teaching in the classroom is the way teaching should be, a visiting professor said Tuesday.

Janet Mihuc, visiting professor of biology from Louisiana State University, said inquiry encourages students to find new information, and the instructor is only the facilitator.

Mihuc presented her idea during a seminar organized by the Division of Biology.

"Students show greater interest when they have a chance to engage with science in the classroom," Mihuc said.

Using the inquiry method, instructors would have more ways to test the students through reports and observation results.

For the inquiry method, the relationship between lecture and lab is very close, Mihuc said.

To demonstrate the inquiry method, Mihuc presented an investigation involving decomposition of leaf litter in soil microcosms.

"I chose decomposition as the focus for my activity because I feel it is often neglected in biology classes," Mihuc said.

The decomposition experiment can be conducted in high school or college, Mihuc said.

"Decomposition is a relatively slow process, so this is a long experiment," Mihuc said.

It takes nearly six weeks for the experiment to conclude, she said.

During the six weeks, students can gather and observe a wide variety of information, she said.

The students can look at forms of soil fungi, the invertebrates in the soil and how much weight the soil loses throughout the experiment.

The amount of information that comes through from this experiment, is low but the quality is high, and the retention rate is good, Mihuc said.

The experiment gives students information that can be easily understood, Mihuc said.

Mihuc conducted a student evaluation for this experiment and found students felt most positively about the interest of the experiment.

"For students, it's something they're learning and is new to them," Mihuc said.

The information obtained from this experiment can be used as the basis for discussion in class, Mihuc said.

The students should be encouraged to apply what they learned from the experiment, she said.

A question was raised on the danger of teaching students one method through the inquiry method and not preparing them for upper-level classes.

Mihuc replied by saying the trade-off is worth it here where the students learn valuable material that will stay with them forever, instead of cramming for an exam and then forgetting everything.

► FINE ARTS COUNCIL

Indian group receives funds for music recital

■ Group creates music, dance, theater to promote Indian culture

Richea Lecklider
staff reporter

The Fine Arts Council allocated $1,000 to the Society for Appreciation of Bharatiya Arts and Heritage Tuesday.

The society, which has 75 members, promotes the creation and promotion of Indian culture through music, dance and theater.

It is a non-profit organization that does not require members to pay membership dues, and its only source of funding is through groups such as the Fine Arts Council.

SABAH requested $1,405 from the Fine Arts Council to fund an Indian classical music recital.

The artist who will perform has not yet been selected. Members of Fine Arts Council also suggested the group seek funding through the Department of Music.

The council also made the stipulation that SABAH spend more dollars of its allocation money on photocopying and publicity so more people will be informed of the performance.

Jack Flower, head of the music department and Fine Arts Council member, said SABAH usually picks quality artists to perform.

During the meeting it was also mentioned that in a future Student Governing Association meeting there will be a proposal made that the organizations on campus be put into more specific categories, such as sports, music and others.

Those organizations might then be more aware of what category they fall under and of the appropriate group to go to when considering asking for funding.

The council also discussed that after April 17 Peter Wallace, the current chair of Fine Arts Council, will resign.

Members of the organization said they felt Wallace had been the most successful chair for the Fine Arts Council.

► Man kills friend to pay off $2,000 debt

WILLIAMSON, W.Va. — A man admitted Tuesday that he killed a popular cheerleader and homecoming queen to pay off a $2,000 drug debt, saying a dealer put a gun to his head while he shot the teen-age girl twice.

"He pulled out a gun and put it to the back of my head and told me if I didn't shoot her he would shoot me, and then he would go find and shoot my family, and I loaded the gun and turned my head and pulled the trigger," James C. "Chris" Pennington, who was friends with the girl, testified.

Pennington, 21, pleaded guilty to murder and kidnapping charges in the death of 17-year-old Michael Ann "Miki" Koontz.

He faces life in prison, but prosecutors agreed to recommend parole after 20 years if he keeps his promise to testify against Robert Jerome Warren Sr., the alleged leader of the drug ring.

Warren has not been charged in Koontz's death but has pleaded guilty to federal drug charges and is to be sentenced May 14.

the art of shamanism

Magic, therapy provide basis for shamanism

"Shamanism and similar areas of research have gained in significance because they postulate new ideas about mind and spirit. They speak of things like vastly expanding the realm of consciousness ... the belief, the knowledge, and even the experience that our physical world of the senses is a mere illusion, a world of shadows, and that the three-dimensional tool we call our body serves only as a container or dwelling place for Something infinitely greater and more comprehensive than that body and which constitutes the matrix of the real life." — Hogler Kalweit, "Dreamtime and Inner Space"

story by Kris Bethea

Shamans provide healing, therapy, advice, teaching or spiritual meaning through the use of altered states of consciousness. It is a belief in the powers in the manipulation of spiritual forces to benefit the human race.

"Shamanism is treated as a religion, but it's not," Martin Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, said. "Shamanism describes an approach rather than a specific religion."

It is a method of communicating and getting in touch with the supernatural, Ottenheimer said.

"Shamanism is the belief of spirits inhabiting objects such as trees, rocks and earth," Mark Jameson, philosopher from Lawrence, said. "It is a metaphysical personification."

Jameson said shamanism can be considered a magical belief.

"Every religion practices magic, from Christianity on down," Jameson said.

What people call spells are simply more stylized forms of prayer, Jameson said.

Teaching itself can take on characteristics of shamanism, Ottenheimer said.

Ottenheimer said a teacher is very often expressing cultural values and concepts.

"A good teacher sometimes makes students aware of fundamental values about themselves," Ottenheimer said. "Shamanism can bring these out as well."

A shaman in performance must learn communication and master fundamental social values into social expression, Ottenheimer said.

"Shamans must go through a vigorous training," Ottenheimer said. That training is from tradition.

"It's typical for shamans to go through four years of training," Ottenheimer said.

These four years can be broken into various categories.

One would learn which locally-grown materials can be used for medicinal purposes, and which can be traded with other practicing shamans, Ottenheimer said.

"Another one would be sleight of hand and ventriloquism," he said. "They would learn how to use helpers in creating a culturally appropriate setting for shamanistic purposes."

Next would be learning to communicate with appropriate spirits.

"And fourth would be how to perform a curing ritual," he said.

There are many different types of shamanism. It is practiced throughout the world. Within each area, there are different means of achieving the state of being a shaman.

Altered states of consciousness may be achieved by various methods including music, chanting, drums, meditation, solitude, movement, dancing and psychoactive plants.

"Although starvation, self-inflicted pain and hallucinogens are effective tools for altering conscious states, they clash with modern western consciousness," Cameron Kelly, junior in English literature, said.

Kelly said there is an alternative to tradition, which is neo-shamanism.

"Drumming, dance and chant can accomplish the same goals, at what is perceived as a lower cost," Kelly said.

The method of shamanism depends on the shamanistic tradition, Ottenheimer said. The western hemisphere has its own form. She said the most common form of achieving shamanistic alternate consciousness is through percussion instruments.

Drumming is the most common, but is not the only method.

The way to learn shamanism is from a shaman who knows what he is talking about, Jameson said.

"What many modern shaman sometimes fail to remember is that their limited training does not begin to compare with the ordeals experienced by traditional shaman," Kelly said. "However, I don't think this fact necessarily lessens the experiences of the neo-shaman encountered in our society."

Children of shamans can become shamans, but it is not necessary, Ottenheimer said.

Shamans are not born with the knowledge, Jameson said.

"There is always a powerful tie through heredity," Jameson said. "But just because you are a shaman's son doesn't mean you will become one."

Ottenheimer said some form of shamanism occurs almost everywhere.

"Some people call it the oldest profession," Ottenheimer said.

When you look at some of the earliest archeological sites, you can find some indirect evidence that shamanism was around then.

"Paraphernalia for shamans has been found in these early sites," Ottenheimer said.

Ottenheimer is not certain how much shamanism is practiced in the Manhattan area.

"There are some people who are involved in it and don't want others to know," Ottenheimer said. "There are definitely people involved in shamanism in the Oklahoma and Kansas area."

Native Americans believe more in the world of spirits, Jameson said.

"American Indians practice a form of shamanism," Jameson said. "And others such as druidism also practice a form of shamanism. These and others have the belief that spirits inhabit inanimate objects. It goes beyond trees. It goes to rivers, to mountains and everywhere."

Shamans sometimes get together with other shamans, Ottenheimer said.

"They will communicate together about techniques and medicines," Ottenheimer said. "The actual performance will usually be undertaken by a single shaman, or a shaman with a group of interns."

She said each community will have its own principle shaman for its personal performances and rituals.

Like any belief system, they are dynamic. They change," Holly Mayland, graduate student in entomology, said. It depends on where you learn things.

"All too many people these days get their beliefs from Dungeons and Dragons and other role-playing games," Mayland said.

"Unfortunately in our society of instant gratification, I see frequent examples of weekend Shaman who don't do justice to their legacy because they are not dedicated," Kelly said.

"They are simply looking for another avenue to a quick power fix."

THESE PEOPLE DESERVE A HAND
 Miami University of Ohio has a new campus grope, er, group. The small college now recognizes the Miami University Masturbation Society as an official campus organization. One cannot help but wonder if the male-to-female ratio might be a little off, somehow prompting the formation of such a club dedicated to, well, corralling tadpoles and nub rubbing.

If you are like me, you are wondering (perhaps with a certain amount of nausea) what the meetings are like. Do they all sit in a big circle? Do they get awards for speed? Distance? Endurance? Best of show? Most improved?

And what are the membership requirements? The club's executive supreme dictator is planning to hold a Bring Your Own Kleenex Dance. With an event name like that, they will need as much Kleenex as they can.

SCOTT ALLEN Miller

Have no fear about K-State creating a similar club. With Student Senate and the Board of Student Publications Inc. who needs a masturbation club?

PRIVATE SCHOOL ... WHAT A DRAG

Henry Holmes enrolled his 6-year-old son in a private school in Baltimore. He undoubtedly believed his kid would be safe from the notoriously corrupt influences of the modern public education system.

When he visited his son at school one day, Holmes was shocked to find him playing house. His son was the mommy, wearing a white dress covered with sequins.

Basically, Holmes was paying tuition so that his little Gerald could pretend to be Geraldine. So he withdrew him and put him in public school.

If Kevyn Jacobs wears a dress to campus again, I am going to ask him if he went to private school, too.

DON'T PUT YOUR MOUTH ON THE FOUNTAIN

Goa, India, hosted the human race's first World Conference on Auto-Urine Therapy recently. Six hundred representatives from 17 countries met to discuss the healthful benefits of drinking one's own urine.

The conference was presented by the Water of Life Foundation. The group's president, G.K. Thakkar, claimed that drinking his own urine cured him of dysentery, skin problems and even made him a good public speaker. The water in India must be really, really bad.

This newsgroup probably started out with good intentions. This was the way the people of the information age could network and keep in touch about the Second Coming of the King. The newsgroup has devolved into mindless chatter, cascades of posts that are unrelated to the newsgroup's subject matter, and is filled with utter verbal manure. In other words, it is much like the rest of Usenet.

CIVIL RIGHTS

Camera catches police clubbing

Associated Press

LOS ANGELES (AP) — The FBI opened a civil rights investigation Tuesday into the videotaped clubbing of two illegal immigrants, and the Mexican government condemned the beating as a flagrant violation of the rights of its citizens.

Sheriff's deputies clubbed the immigrants Monday after chasing a battered pickup crammed with people suspected of sneaking across the border. TV news helicopters captured the beating on video in broad daylight.

During the chase, the pickup reached speeds of 100 mph, its shabby camper top disintegrating in the wind to reveal the people crammed inside.

"People inside were throwing things at officers in the chase and at other cars, hitting some of them," sheriff's Sgt. Mark Lohman said Tuesday.

The truck finally stopped on the side of the freeway, and the passengers in back ran away.

One deputy, holding his baton two-handed like a baseball bat, was videotaped clubbing the driver on the back and shoulders, even as the driver fell, face down, on the ground.

When a woman got out of the cab, the same deputy beat her in the back with the baton, then grabbed her by the hair and pulled her to the ground. At least one other deputy struck her with his baton. Neither person, both Mexicans, appeared to resist or attempt to get away from the white officers.

Andrian Flores Martinez, 26, the driver, had bruises and a possible broken elbow, authorities said. He was jailed, while 33-year-old Leticia Gonzalez, who was bruised on her face and arms, was released Tuesday to the custody of her lawyer, David Ross.

Police, who initially said the truck carried 21 people, said Tuesday that 17, besides the couple in the cab, were in the custody of the Immigration and Naturalization Service pending deportation proceedings.

Film of the beatings was shown repeatedly on television in Mexico and the United States, provoking a furious outcry from human rights groups.

"He's concerned," White House press secretary Mike McCurry said when asked President Clinton's reaction.

The sheriff's department identified the deputies Tuesday as Tracy Watson and Kurtis Franklin and said both were suspended without pay. Franklin has been with the department for 20 years, Watson for five.

"I'm not going to stand up here and say that there was no force used, because you would laugh me out of the room," Lohman told reporters. "We saw it, we saw the same videotape that everyone's seen, and we're embarrassed."

Both the Los Angeles and Riverside sheriff's departments were investigating. The clubbing happened in South El Monte in Los Angeles County, but the pursuit began in Riverside County.

Mexico's Department of Foreign Relations said it had "expressed its indignation" and "energetically condemned this flagrant violation of the human rights of its nationals" in a letter to the State Department.

The letter hinted at racism as a motive for the beating, saying it demonstrates the need to "eradicate discriminatory attitudes that lead to acts of institutional violence."

It also demanded an investigation by the Justice Department, saying the Mexican government "will closely follow the development of this investigation until its satisfactory conclusion."

Immigrant rights and civil liberties organizations gathered Tuesday at the downtown federal building, chanting "Justicia!"

"What we have here is an ugly reminder of the violent hate crimes that several police officers engage in to manifest their hatred towards minorities," said Hector Brolo, national president of the Mexican American Political Association. We will not rest until these people are arrested. I'm firmly convinced this was racially motivated."

MINIMUM WAGE

Democrats attack Bob Dole for blocking wage increase

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Democrats are trying to make Republican presidential candidate Sen. Bob Dole pay a political price for blocking an attempt to increase the minimum wage last week.

They marked the fifth anniversary of the last minimum-wage rise with a news conference comparing the 37.5-percent inflation-adjusted increase in Dole's own salary since he entered Congress in 1961 with the 23.3-percent, inflation-adjusted decline in the minimum wage over the period.

"It's no wonder Sen. Dole was surprised to find out that the economy was going to be a campaign issue. If working families had gotten as many pay raises as Sen. Dole has, they wouldn't be worried either," Democratic National Committee Chairman Don Fowler said at a news conference Monday.

Aides to Dole, the Senate majority leader and President Clinton's certain opponent in the November election, counterattacked, pointing out that Clinton did not propose an increase when Democrats controlled Congress.

Opponents argue it will destroy entry-level jobs for poor and minority youths, and Republicans cited a three-year-old Clinton statement that raising the minimum wage was the wrong way to raise the incomes of low-wage earners.

"The Democrats are playing maximum politics. It's hard to take their rhetoric seriously when President Clinton... suddenly proposes a minimum wage increase when the organized labor bosses offer him $35 million in support," Dole spokesman Clarkson Hine said.

Police detain suspect in murder case

Associated Press

PITTSBURG — Police said Tuesday they were holding a suspect in the murder of a Pittsburg State University student, a slaying that has frightened the tight-knit campus community.

The man was arrested Monday night in Springfield, Mo., on an unrelated rape charge from Crawford County.

Police identified him as Gary W. Kleypas, who is on parole after serving time in Missouri for murder.

Kleypas was being held in the Crawford County jail, after he was returned from Springfield.

Kleypas lived two houses away from 20-year-old Carrie Arlene Williams, Parsons, who was found dead in her apartment Saturday afternoon.

"Kleypas has not been arrested for the murder of Carrie Williams but is the focus of the investigation," the Pittsburg Police Department said in a news release.

University officials had scheduled a campus-wide meeting for Tuesday night to discuss safety questions and tell students about counseling services.

Kleypas, 40, was convicted of second-degree murder in 1977 and sentenced to 30 years in prison.

He was on parole when Williams was killed, and was under the supervision of the parole office in Pittsburg.

Police did not say when Kleypas, a nursing student at Pittsburg State, was paroled.

The investigation into Williams' slaying was continuing by a task force of 24 detectives.

The slaying alarmed the close-knit campus of 6,500 students.

The university increased security at campus dorms, allowing entry only to those with proper identification. Neighbors near where Williams lived also were nervous.

Rumors about the murder were flooding the town.

TOBACCO

"I don't see any reason why they shouldn't sell tobacco products."

While many non-smokers feel the decision will be irrelevant as long as smoking continues to be restricted in the Union, some smokers oppose the decision, including Anthony Golden, sophomore in interior architecture.

"It sucks. They're going to have cigarette butts all over the place," Golden said. "It's bad enough already, and I'm a smoker, but most smokers have a bad problem with littering."

But most smokers support the decision, recognizing that sales of tobacco products may financially benefit the Union as well as make it more convenient to buy cigarettes.

"It would probably be a good business move because there's always people sitting out here smoking, and they can charge a lot more money, and the hardcore smokers are going to pay it because they're out of smokes and between classes," Eric Parker, sophomore in modern languages, said.

Any additional revenue the sales bring might be an advantage to students, Leonard Adams, graduate in marketing, said.

"I don't see why they shouldn't sell it. Hell, they could make some money so they don't have to keep jacking up tuition," he said.

well with others in diverse circumstances. You also need to be able to divorce your feelings in order to maintain a balance," he said.

Otto said because of the committee's responsibility to set the budget of the Collegian and Royal Purple, sometimes there is animosity toward committee members.

"You are never the popular people," he said.

Otto, whose term expires in 1997, said the composition of the board has been changed this year.

"There are two positions with a two-year term, one of which will be elected this year. There is also three positions each with a one-year term," he said.

Otto said it is becoming harder to gain a position on the board.

"The competition is going up, which is really nice," he said.

Otto said from those elected by the student body to the board, the board itself chooses a finance committee chairman, a chairman of the board, a personnel chair and a secretary for the board. He said those positions would most likely be chosen in May.

State might lower budget

Associated Press

TOPEKA — Negotiators plan to ask the House and Senate to approve a compromise budget proposal that would decrease overall state spending for the first time in two decades.

The proposal would allow government agencies to spend $7.8 billion during the state's 1997 fiscal year, which begins July 1. The proposal calls for a decrease in overall spending of about $90 million, or 1.2 percent.

It also will represent the first time in modern legislative history that both chambers would take a vote on the final version of most of the state budget in one bill. Traditionally, they have voted upon as many as 20 separate bills.

Enactment of the budget proposal means that public schools would not receive any more money per pupil from the state. Universities would see no increase in money for operating expenses, and poor families would not see an increase in welfare benefits.

Gov. Bill Graves proposed an overall decrease in state spending, and Republicans leaders' goal has been to stay within his recommendations. The budget proposal contains about $4 million less in spending.

A joint conference committee, three senators and three House members, finished drafting the proposals Friday.

The House and Senate reconvene Thursday, and representatives are scheduled to take up the conference committee's report first.

However, adoption of the conference committee's report still would leave some budget issues unresolved.

First, legislators must resolve the issue of whether state employees will receive pay raises. Graves has recommended a 2.5 percent pay increase for most, but not all, employees, based on their serving another year in government.

Secondly, legislators will draft one final spending bill, the Omnibus Appropriations Act, that corrects mistakes, finances policy changes made this year and corrects previous cost estimates for some programs.

The Legislature is expected to finish work on the omnibus bill during its final wrapup session, scheduled for April 24-26.

Still, agreement on most of the budget came relatively easily.

Both houses agreed that the base budget for public schools should remain constant at $3,626 per pupil.

They also agreed on most items in the budget for the State Board of Regents and its six universities.

The only other huge difference between the House and Senate came over a program under which the court system evaluates juvenile offenders.

The House appropriated no money, while the Senate included $2.8 million in the judicial branch's budget.

The negotiators accepted the Senate proposal.

UNABOMBER

Suspect found in connection with bombings

Associated Press

LINCOLN, Mont. — A former Berkeley professor suspected by relatives of being the Unabomber was taken into custody Wednesday while federal agents searched his cabin near a mountain pass on the Continental Divide.

A member of the Unabomb task force, demanding anonymity, told the Associated Press the suspect was named Ted John Kaczynski and had been using many aliases.

A federal law enforcement official said Kaczynski was taken into custody so he would not interfere with the search of his home, but he was neither arrested nor charged.

Unabomber sketch

Chuck O'Reilly, sheriff of Lewis and Clark County, said 20 FBI agents searched the home near Stemple Pass, between Helena and Lincoln.

Butch Gehring, a neighbor, said the small cabin was the home of a Ted Kaczynski since 1971.

"He was real shy, real quiet. His conversations were short," Gehring said, describing Kaczynski as a hermit.

The search for the Unabomber in western Montana appeared to have no connection to the standoff between federal agents and the anti-government separatists known as Freemen near the town of Jordan, 350 miles to the east.

A Theodore J. Kaczynski, born May 22, 1942, in Chicago, was graduated from Harvard in 1962 and taught as an assistant professor of mathematics at Berkeley in the 1967-68 school year, according to Harvard and Berkeley records. He resigned in June 1969.

"We like the looks of this guy as the Unabomber, but we don't have make-or-break evidence yet," one federal law enforcement official said. "We have some writings that match up, but we don't have his tools yet. We want the irrefutable motherlode of evidence."

One law enforcement official said Kaczynski grew up in Chicago and received a graduate degree

Senators represent student opinions

Senate responsible for legislation, debating ideas at weekly meetings

Bill Bontempo
staff writer

After the April 9-10 elections some of the names of student senators will change, but Student Senate will still have the same responsibility of representing student views on political issues.

"It's the organization that speaks for students on campus," John Potter, Senate chair, said.

Every Thursday Senate meets to discuss legislation affecting students. Potter said the most important issue is the allocation of student privilege fee funds.

"Student services is the largest issue that we deal with every year," Potter said.

Privilege fee budgets include student health, recreation services, Student Publications Inc. and other student-oriented services with an annual budget in excess of $7.5 million.

Potter said senators seek to find the opinion of the students through interaction and other methods.

Sometimes senators are required to have Senate visitations, which are open forums where senators are required to speak about an issue and answer questions from students.

Senators are responsible for drafting legislation and debating their ideas in the open forum at the weekly meetings.

For legislation to pass there must be a majority vote by Senate unless the legislation involves the increase or decrease in a fee. Fee increases and decreases require a two-thirds vote to be passed.

All legislation passed in Senate must go through the executive branch for final passage.

In addition to the student senators, there are two faculty Student Senate members and 25 Student Senate interns.

Bill Muir, faculty senate representative, said the faculty senators serve to represent the faculty viewpoint on legislation.

One faculty senator is appointed by Faculty Senate, and the other is appointed by the vice president for institutional advancement. Muir said this allocation system creates a process allowing one faculty student senator to represent the admin-

MAN SENTENCED FOR SEXUAL BATTERY

Leroy Burke Jr., former K-State student and owner of Portraits by LBJ, was sentenced to one year of probation Monday following charges of sexual battery against two female minors.

Mike Kearns, assistant Riley county attorney, said Burke pleaded no contest to one of the two counts against him.

The conviction was for the count of sexual battery that occurred Nov. 27, 1995.

The other count was dismissed after an agreement between Burke and the second victim. Judge Jerry Mershon also sentenced Burke to pay restitution, undergo a mental health assessment and perform 50 hours of community service.

"I had asked for 100 hours, but the judge came down with 50 hours," Kearns said.

Burke began attending K-State in 1983 and was a member of the marching band but never graduated. He was arrested Jan. 20.

Candidates assure excitement

Hansen, Otto say biggest opponent is student apathy

Scott M. Ladd

When students hit the polls next week, two candidates hope experience and cooperation are on students' minds.

However, Chris Hansen, junior in engineering and Aaron Otto, junior in political science, know they have to get the students into the polls first.

"What I have seen in the past three years is that you're not running against your opponents — you're running against apathy," said Otto, who is running as the vice presidential part of the ticket. "Our biggest goal is going to be generating the excitement needed to bring them into the polls."

While selling T-shirts prior to spring break and meeting with various groups might cause the excitement needed, Hansen, who is running for student body president, points out the excitement won't end at the polls.

"One of the things that has always disappointed me is that you get through the campaigns and all the talk, but what happens afterwards is the elected go on with a few of their pet projects," Hansen said. "I think it would be a blast to go back to the fraternities, the sororities and the groups on campus and do visitations throughout the year in order to keep in touch."

It is the follow-up meetings that Otto and Hansen are hoping will keep them in touch with their platform.

"Things like the teacher evaluations and the

STUDY SHOWS INJECTIONS RELIEVE IMPOTENCE IN MOST MEN

BOSTON (AP) — The first injection treatment approved for relieving impotence works well in most men, allowing sexual intercourse both they and their partners consider satisfactory, a study found.

Self-administered injections have been used routinely for the past decade to help men who have trouble achieving erections. However, only one of them, the drug Caverject, has been formally approved by the Food and Drug Administration for this purpose.

A study of the drug by its maker, Upjohn Co., was published in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine.

In an accompanying editorial, Dr. Larry I. Lipshultz of Baylor College of Medicine in Houston called the injections "a well-accepted and efficacious treatment for erectile dysfunction."

The study involved 683 men who used the injections for six months.

The men reported being able to have sexual activity after 94 percent of the injections.

The sex was described as satisfactory by 87 percent of the men and 86 percent of their partners.

The chief complaint: mild penile pain reported occasionally by half of the men.

The treatment appears to work regardless of whether the impotence is caused by nerve, blood flow or psychological problems.

Caverject, known generically as alprostadil, was approved by the FDA last July.

It is a synthetic form of the hormone prostaglandin E-1 and works by relaxing muscle tissue in the penis to improve blood flow.

It costs $15 to $25 per dose.

The study, directed by Dr. Otto I. Linet, was conducted at 51 sites across the United States.

CLINTON DENIES ILLEGAL ACT

LITTLE ROCK, Ark. (AP) — A banker at the center of the Whitewater case testified that then-Gov. Bill Clinton benefited from a $300,000 loan that Clinton arranged with the condition: "My name can't show up on this."

David Hale's testimony Tuesday was the first time it has been alleged under oath that the president benefited from an illegal loan.

The White House had no comment, but Clinton's personal lawyer, David Kendall, said the president stood by his unequivocal denial of wrongdoing.

Hale said he, Clinton and James McDougal agreed at a meeting in early 1986 that Hale's lending company would make a $150,000 loan on paper to McDougal's wife, Susan, but that the money would go to Clinton.

BOARDS' ETHICS QUESTIONED

WASHINGTON (AP) — Statistics indicating that some state medical boards are far less aggressive in disciplining doctors than others should sound an alarm to people in states with low punishment rates, consumer advocates say.

"Often, they are protecting doctors from being disciplined," said Dr. Sidney M. Wolfe, director of Public Citizen's Health Research Group, a consumer organization.

"There are a small number that are actually protecting patients from the doctors."

Wolfe seized on a report released Tuesday by the Federation of State Medical Boards that found some states are 10 times more likely than others to mete out punishments for offenses ranging from insurance fraud to sexual misconduct to incompetence.

Successful boards depend on aggressive leadership, which only comes when the public demands it, Wolfe said.

Man confesses to Pittsburg murder

QUICKread

► Convicted murderer Gary W. Kleypas was taken into custody Monday night for the murder of a 20-year-old Pittsburg State University student

Associated Press

PITTSBURG — A convicted murderer who lives two houses away from where a 20-year-old Pittsburg State University student was found dead Saturday has confessed to the killing, the Crawford County Sheriff's Department said.

Sheriff Sandy Horton said Gary W. Kleypas, a nursing student at PSU, had confessed Tuesday afternoon to killing Carrie Arlene Williams. Williams, a junior from Parsons majoring in fashion merchandising, was found dead in her apartment Saturday afternoon about a block from campus.

Kleypas, 40, was taken into custody Monday night in a Springfield, Mo., hospital where he was treated for "apparent self-inflicted wounds," said Pittsburg Police Chief Mike Hall.

Horton said Kleypas waived extradition to Kansas and gave his confession a short time after being apprehended. Horton also said Kleypas faces parole violation charges in Missouri and Kansas.

Kleypas was arraigned Wednesday on an unrelated rape charge and was being held without bail in Crawford County Jail in Girard.

No charges had been filed Wednesday in the Williams killing.

Kleypas was convicted of second-degree murder in 1977 in Barry County, Mo., and sentenced to 30 years in prison. He was paroled in October 1992 and had lived in Pittsburg since then. He was under the supervision of the Kansas Department of Corrections parole office in Pittsburg.

Williams' death brought back memories of another killing of a Pittsburg State student.

The 1993 death of Stephanie Schmidt prompted Kansas lawmakers to pass a sexual predator act the next year.

The act allowed courts to commit violent sexual offenders to a state hospital after they had served their prison sentences.

The Kansas Supreme Court ruled the law unconstitutional, and the state has asked the U.S. Supreme Court to review the Kansas law.

Donald Ray Gideon, who had been conditionally released from a prison sentence for an earlier rape, pleaded guilty to first-degree murder, rape and other charges in Schmidt's slaying. He was sentenced to almost 100 years behind bars.

Williams was scheduled to be buried Wednesday. She was engaged and had plans to get married next year.

The Rev. J.C. Kelley said Williams, a high school tennis player, also was active in the church youth group. While attending Pittsburg State, she had returned home on weekends to attend church.

Members of the Pittsburg State student chapter of the Kansas Association of Family and Consumer Sciences on Monday prepared black ribbons to distribute on campus in memory of their friend and classmate.

Kimberly Hart, president of the group, said students who live in the area are concerned for their safety and have been for quite some time.

She mentioned several crime complaints in the area around Williams' apartment complex.

"This has been going on since early last fall," she said.

University officials had a campus-wide meeting Tuesday night to discuss security measures and counseling options for students.

Some people expressed anger that Kleypas had been allowed to live and study at Pittsburg State without having to reveal his criminal record.

"How does someone with a murder record get in the nursing program at Pittsburg State University?" said Bill Ramage, a graduate of the university.

"Not everyone in prison is rehabilitatable," said Gene Schmidt, the father of Stephanie Schmidt, in response to Ramage's question. "I'm not justifying this man. I'm saying we have to be careful."

► LAW

1994 Sexual Predator Act in revision

Associated Press

TOPEKA — A joint legislative committee sent a sexual predator bill that would keep those convicted of violent sexual crimes in a mental hospital after serving a prison sentence to the House for a vote.

Legislators are attempting to rewrite the 1994 Sexual Predator Act after the Kansas Supreme Court's recent decision finding it unconstitutional.

In a 4-3 decision, the state's highest court said the law represented a violation of a criminal's right to due legal process.

If passed, the bill would commit the convicts by petitioning the court to send them to a mental hospital for care and treatment for a mental illness instead of the civil law procedure used in the 1994 act, said Sen. Tim Emert, R-Independence.

Rep. Mike O'Neal, R-Hutchinson, said although the state Supreme Court's decision is being appealed to the U.S. Supreme Court, enacting another law would serve as a backup measure.

"The current sexual predator law may be successful, but we need a fall-back position," said O'Neal, chairman of the joint judiciary conference committee.

The bill drew criticism from mental health advocates who argued that sexual predators should be classified separately from the mentally ill.

"Inclusion of sex offenders under the mental illness definition increases the stigma of mental illness that so many of us are trying to eliminate," said Terry Larson, executive director of the Kansas Alliance for the Mentally Ill.

But O'Neal said the state Supreme Court ruled that the criminals have to be treated for mental illness to be kept in state hospitals, preventing legislators from making a distinction. Seven men convicted of violent sexual crimes could be released if the law is not passed and the state Supreme Court's ruling on the 1994 act is not overturned.

Prison officials consider molester's castration plea

Associated Press

HUNTSVILLE, Texas — Texas parole officials are considering a convicted child molester's long-standing request to be castrated after his threats to strike again delayed his scheduled release from prison.

Larry Don McQuay, 32, was about two hours away from being released to a halfway house Tuesday when protests from victims rights advocates prompted parole officials to delay the release.

During his six years behind bars for molesting a 6-year-old boy in San Antonio, McQuay had campaigned unsuccessfully to be castrated, saying it was his only chance of controlling his urge to molest again.

Prison officials denied the request because it was considered elective surgery. A move by the legislature to allow such operations failed last year.

McQuay has called the refusal to castrate child molesters "barbaric for the children who will be raped by the untreated monster."

After meeting with McQuay for 90 minutes Tuesday, state parole board chairman Victor Rodriguez said the castration request is now being reconsidered.

"That is an issue that is alive and well,"

Rodriguez said. "We're going to explore ... if it is a reasonable and prudent thing for us to do."

"If we can't do it, I want to know why we can't do it. I think this is a case that allows us to go a step farther."

Rodriguez said a review of the case would take a couple of days.

Supporters of voluntary castration say studies show that repeat offenses drop sharply in countries where the procedure is used.

McQuay claims to have molested more than 200 youngsters. And while in prison, he has sent at least six letters — sometimes signed "child molesting demon" — to a victims rights group warning he would do even more harm to children if released.

"I am doomed to eventually rape then murder my poor little victims to keep them from telling on me," he said in one message to the Houston-based group Justice for All.

McQuay was scheduled to have two years knocked off his eight-year sentence. But state parole officials had requested copies of the letters and they could strip McQuay of those "good time" credits if the comments "can be considered threatening to individuals and the public at large," said David Nunnelee, spokesman for the Texas Department of Criminal Justice.

► FEDERAL APPEALS COURT

Assisted suicide supported

NEW YORK — A federal appeals court ruled that doctors in New York state can in some cases prescribe life-ending drugs to mentally competent patients who are terminally ill.

The 2nd U.S. Circuit Court of Appeals on Tuesday rejected two state laws banning doctor-assisted suicide, saying the laws violated the Constitution by failing to treat people equally.

The court said it would be discriminatory to refuse to let dying patients end their lives with medication while others on life-support systems can be disconnected at their request.

"Physicians do not fulfill the role of 'killer' by prescribing drugs to hasten death any more than they do by disconnecting life-support systems," the three-judge appeals panel said.

The panel refused, however, to declare doctor-assisted suicide a fundamental constitutional right, saying it is not deeply rooted in the nation's traditions and history.

A federal appeals court in San Francisco made that declaration last month in striking down Washington state's ban, saying that mentally competent, terminally ill adults have a constitutional right to die.

New York Attorney General Dennis Vacco said the appeals court had given doctors a license to kill and that he was prepared to challenge the ruling in the U.S. Supreme Court.

"By opening this door, the court has set us on a path which will lead to abuse that is virtually undetectable until it is too late," Vacco said.

The 2nd Circuit reversed a 1994 ruling by a judge who had refused to strike down two state laws banning physician-assisted suicide.

Under the panel's ruling, doctors can prescribe life-ending drugs upon request to terminally ill patients who are mentally competent and able to take the drugs on their own.

"What interest can the state possibly have in requiring the prolongation of a life that is all but ended?" the judges asked. "And what business is it of the state to require the continuation of agony when the result is imminent and inevitable?"

The answer to these questions: None.

The ruling came in a case brought by three doctors who had sought to speed the deaths of three terminally ill patients.

The patients have since died.

College students need to be aware of STDs

QUICKread

College students are in the high-risk group for sexually transmitted diseases. Abstinence is the surest way to avoid STDs. If you are going to partake in sexual activity, use a condom.

We, college students, are in a high-risk group for sexually transmitted diseases, right?

Right. Anyone who stops by the STD HIV AIDS Peer Education group's table at the Sports Illustrated Campus Fest today in the free-speech zone will learn STDs infect at least 55 million Americans. That's one in four people, according to the American Social Health Association.

Two-thirds of new infections occur in people younger than age 25. That's us, folks.

ASHA reports a gap between the reality of the epidemic and public awareness of STDs.

Can you name an STD other than AIDS? The AIDS virus isn't the only one out there, yet 30 percent of respondents to a Gallup poll couldn't name any other. Educate yourself about these diseases and what you can do to prevent the spread of them.

Stop by the table today and learn a few things. Heck, you might even get some free Jolly Ranchers.

But, if you don't make it to SHAPE's table, please remember a few things.

Abstinence remains the only way to protect yourself from possible infection.

Sure, you've heard it all before, whether it was your parents' birds and bees talk or your sixth grade gym teacher yammering at you, but it's the truth. The safest sex is no sex at all. It's difficult to be infected if you're not doing anything.

But, if you are going to have sex, be safe.

Do something nice for your significant other. Protect him or her and yourself.

Use a condom. Don't say they're inconvenient, and it doesn't feel as good. It only takes a moment to put one on, and it could save your life.

Government needs change

We want to help shape the direction of K-State next year and beyond — everything from the way we pay tuition and campus privilege fees to the change in how the student government is run.

We would like to help make the decisions that will determine the direction K-State takes and make sure the students' voices are heard at all levels of the decision-making process.

That's why we, Chris Hansen and Aaron Otto, are running for student body president and vice president.

We think the following issues are of concern to all students on campus because they are more than just concerns that will not be acted upon. They are issues that can, must and will be resolved under the Hansen and Otto administration.

■ Teacher evaluations should be made public. We will fight to make teacher evaluations accessible to students via the World Wide Web and printed booklets. Most students put a lot of thought into teacher evaluations, and they should be able to benefit from reviewing the results. By allowing students to compare instructors with the evaluation results, students are better able to determine which instructor best meets their learning needs. Faculty Senate controls the results of the teacher evaluations. In the interest of protecting personnel records, the evaluations are closed to the students, so students cannot benefit from their results. We will work with Faculty Senate to find a way to protect the rights of students and faculty members.

■ We support quality student services for K-State students. The experiences of higher education stretch far beyond the classroom. Cultural programs, athletics, student health and other support services play a vital role in the K-State experience. We will ensure that services are high-quality and cost-effective and meet the needs of our students. Through requiring services to perform self-evaluations, we will closely monitor the quality of service provided by K-State's student services. Most importantly, we will strive for balance between reasonable student fees and quality services.

■ We would like to increase campus safety. We will continue to stress the importance of enhancing campus security by pushing for an increased number of campus security cameras and recording equipment. These cameras could add an extra sense of security and serve as a crime deterrent in many of our University's larger parking lots. Our experience working with the city will be an asset in pursuing continued funding for more security lights for campus parking lots and sidewalks. We also support expanding the capabilities and use of the campus escort service, Wildcat Walk.

■ We think making campus more bicycle-friendly is also important. What good is a bike if you can't even ride it through campus or find a rack to chain it to? We both ride bikes to class, and we support the creation of more bike paths on and around campus. We also oppose instituting a mandatory bicycle registration fee.

■ We want to maintain student input at all levels of government. Using our experience and good working relationship with several governing officials, we will make sure K-State students have a constant voice and representation at the different levels of government, including the City Commission, Kansas Board of Regents, state Legislature and University administration.

■ We will lobby state government to appoint a student or recent graduate to the Board of Regents and to retain more tuition money at K-State, where we need it the most. A student or recent graduate would provide additional perspective on important issues such as tuition and curriculum changes to the regents. Retaining tuition dollars on campus will enable the University to provide more class sections, reducing the size of the closed class list, and better educate our students.

■ We support fundamental and historic changes in the Student Governing Association structure and mission. Both of us have been involved in student government in several capacities. We feel SGA's mission is outdated. We support efforts to update the mission to include: 1) serving the students through providing and overseeing quality and needed student services; 2) ensuring that students' voices, opinions and concerns are heard at the city, regents, state and most importantly administrative levels. We also support combining and reducing the number of committees that make up SGA to help provide an efficient and effective way of representing the students.

Kansas had great opportunity to support gay rights with bill

On March 22, the Kansas House of Representatives voted down a bill allowing same-sex marriages.

I say great for the House. They have the right and the power to deny marriage to a whole slew of voters, and they took every advantage of it.

Rep. Greg Packer, Topeka, was even quoted as saying "our religious beliefs tell us that same-sex marriages are not the way to have a prosperous life."

I am glad to see Packer has decided Kansas should have a prosperous life. What I am not happy about is the way they handled the whole thing.

This is a bill that affects a lot of people in one form or another, and it was shot down with little debate and a lot of bad jokes.

The reason given was allowing the marriages would violate the criminal law against sodomy.

The whole question started a few years ago when Hawaii found its ban on same-sex marriages violated its constitutional ban on gender discrimination. If a woman could marry a man, why couldn't a man marry one also?

Hawaii started motions to have the ban repealed, and the religious right howled. Hawaii is still debating this.

If they do pass it, they will be the only state to recognize same-sex marriages as legal. Other states fear that same-gender couples could get married in Hawaii and then sue their home states for equal rights.

Heaven forbid. Gay and lesbian couples have been receiving bad press for years. They have been stereotyped as promiscuous and non-committal.

Oddly enough, the idea of giving them an institution to legalize and sanctify their unions never seems to make it to the table.

I have heard many arguments against this ban from sources I was not expecting. I have also heard many different reasons blamed for the whole thing in the first place.

The media, feminists and Hillary Clinton have all been blamed.

I have been told it is immoral, unjust and just plain wrong, which effectively shuts down any intelligent dialog.

My favorite reason so far has been the assertion that children raised in a gay or lesbian home are more likely to become gay or lesbian themselves.

First of all, children raised in strong loving homes headed by two women or two men will turn out with just as many hang-ups and idiosyncrasies as anyone else.

Secondly, we are all the product of a heterosexual union, and there is nothing anyone can do about it. Claiming children can be persuaded one way or the other is nuts. If nothing else, they will be more tolerant of others. A little tolerance can go a long way these days.

Is it better to have two adults who love each other and the child, or two adults who fight, do not really want to be there and do not care about the child?

But I digress. I have been asked what a straight, intelligent, married person like myself cares what happens to same-sex marriages.

I feel it is the job of all human beings to make sure all the other human beings are as content and well-represented as possible. By denying a segment of the population something as simple as the right to declare their love in public we are creating a repressed population that does not need to be.

So, how about it, House? Do you have the guts to take that first step toward the future?

Somehow, I did not think so.

English should be official language

Contrary to popular belief around here, I think we should make English the official language of the United States.

As I have said before, America is not a melting pot as so many believe. Instead, it is a salad bowl. One reason we fail to melt together as a melting pot is lack of communication. A national language would foster effective communication by requiring everyone to speak and understand the same language.

A law forcing people to understand English and speak English is not unnecessary. Quite the contrary. To be a responsible citizen in a democratic country, people need to understand the issues, receive information and, most importantly, make their views heard. How are these things possible if people cannot understand the language?

This law is already in place in many states. If this law is enacted by the federal government voting ballots, driver's license exams and all other official documents would be in English.

Let's look at the alternative: driver's license exams in Spanish, French or Greek. Non-English speaking individuals take the test in their native language. They pass. Yeah! In their excitement, they run to their cars, jump in and start off down the great expanse of highway to see America. Then they notice one problem.

The road signs are in English.

Here is another example: Voting ballots in Portuguese, Mayan, Martian or whatever. The non-English speaking people read the instructions on how to vote and what to do, which box to check and so on. Then they look at the names of the candidates. All the names ring a bell, but they cannot seem to figure out who stands where on the issues.

The debates and newspaper articles were all in English. So they randomly pick a box and put a check in it. Next thing you know, Pat Buchanan is president.

Needless to say, a year later when ol' Pat has made their lives miserable, and they want to write their congressional representative or write an editorial in the paper about what a racist pig Buchanan is, they are going to want to speak English to get their point across. But the calls will not be returned, and the paper will not run their letters. Why?

Because everyone else speaks English.

Finally, the bill to make English the native language gets voted into existence anyway because the non-English speaking people did not understand what they were voting for.

This law is not a backlash. It is not white supremacy. It has nothing to do with race, religion or ethnicity.

It has to do with communication. It has to do with nationality. If people want to be part of this country, they should be able to communicate with everyone else in the country.

English is a hard language. However, we were all immigrants at one time — many of us from non-English speaking countries. If you are reading this, you obviously learned to at least read English, so how hard can it be?

Most of us are required by our University to learn a foreign language, and we learn it just for a grade. I would hope citizenship would be a little more important than a grade, and thus an equally motivating factor in learning to speak English.

We should all be required to learn English or suffer the consequences of not being a member of society. We should not allow our society to continue to fragment by catering to every other language group.

Where do we draw the line? It is more politically correct to print voting ballots and driver's license tests in English and Spanish? Then what about the Italian or Asian communities? Should we print things in their languages as well? Why not French and Mongolian, too?

I have an idea. Perhaps I should say a modest proposal. Let us let all groups speak whatever languages they want, and then they can isolate themselves in their own communities. We can change the name of the country to The Ununited States of [insert language name here]-Speaking America.

K-Staters chosen for national awards

QUICKread

► K-State is ranked first in the nation among public universities in the number of Barry M. Goldwater scholarship winners.

L.L. Livengood

For the sixth consecutive year, K-State's four Barry M. Goldwater scholarship nominees have been selected to receive an award of up to $14,000 each. K-State, with a total of 27 award winners, is ranked first in the nation among public universities in the number of Goldwater winners. Only a private school, Princeton University, ranks higher with 28 nominees.

John Herbert, junior in chemistry and mathematics; Sonya Koo, sophomore in biochemistry and microbiology; Brian Olsen, sophomore in biology; and Paul Robben, junior in chemistry, were all selected as award recipients by the national committee after completing a lengthy application process.

The process began when the applicants were mailed an invitation to apply for the Goldwater scholarship.

Invitations were sent to students with good grades, especially in science and math courses, who had done research in one of these fields, Olsen said.

"It's specifically for those who intend to go into a career in pure research in chemistry, biology, physics, math, engineering or medicine," Herbert said.

The applicants said they decided to apply for various reasons.

"It's a lot of money," Herbert said. "I probably could have made it without the money, but it's a very prestigious thing."

"It's also outside verification that, yeah, you're a pretty good research person," he said.

Olsen said he also thought of the award as an honor.

"I saw it as a good opportunity to help further some of the goals I have," Olsen said. "It's really a great honor and has gotten me more deeply involved in the research I'm doing in lab."

The applicants were required to complete four essay questions and a two-page research proposal of something they are working on or plan to work on.

This was reviewed by a committee of K-State science and math professors until the four nominees were selected in November.

Then the process of application revisions took place through December and winter break.

"It's a big and hairy time commitment," Herbert said.

The applicants had to keep in mind the audience who would be reading their essays.

"Readers of the essays can be someone from any of the fields," Herbert said. "We were told to assume the reader is knowledgeable in the sciences but not necessarily your field."

Nancy Twiss, scholarship adviser, helped the students revise their essays to meet this requirement.

"Demonstrating you really enjoy science is something Nancy Twiss really stressed," Olsen said. "She's been through this process so many times she knows what the Goldwater committee looks for."

"Nancy Twiss is the biggest reason K-State has so many Goldwaters," Herbert said.

In January, the applicants sent their revised applications to the national committee for the final selection.

The winners were sent award packets by mail in April.

"A congratulatory letter, list of nationwide winners and scholarship materials were included in the packet," Robben said.

The scholarship will cover the cost of tuition, fees and living expenses, such as books and rent, at the university the winner attends up to $7,000 a year, renewable for one year.

Students comprise highest risk group

L.L. Livengood

Students have the opportunity to pause from their fun and games at the Sports Illustrated Campus Fest to learn a little about sexually transmitted diseases.

The STD HIV AIDS Peer Education group have a display table set up at the Fest today as part of STD Awareness Month. The table was also set up Wednesday.

HIV and STD awareness brochures will be available at the table, and SHAPE members will be there to answer questions, Reita Currie, group sponsor, said.

"We have games if weather permits," Currie said.

Students seemed more interested Wednesday in the Jolly Ranchers candy at the table than the information available, Michelle Swanson, junior in biology and SHAPE member, said.

Students, however, are the target of new infection with two-thirds of new infections occurring in people

STDs on the rise

Think sexually transmitted diseases can't affect you? STDs carry some alarming statistics.

- To date, STDs infect at least 55 million Americans, roughly one in four adults.
- Two-thirds of new infections occur in people younger than 25.
- Forty million Americans have genital herpes.
- Four million Americans contract chlamydia each year, and the disease is often symptomless.

younger than 25.

Had the SHAPE group's co-sponsor for the table been able to arrive, the table might have drawn more student interest, Swanson said.

The makers of Trojan condoms were scheduled to share a table with SHAPE, but Swanson said she was not sure why they had not come to the Fest.

"It was my understanding that Trojan was supposed to be at the table with us," Swanson said, "but they couldn't make it."

HIV, AIDS patients demand confidentiality

Associated Press

BOSTON — A coalition of groups that help AIDS victims is accusing a federal agency of violating the confidentiality of more than 100 people who have the virus, and it wants a court to order the practice stopped.

Auditors for the Department of Health and Human Services obtained the names of 113 patients to verify whether they were eligible for federal AIDS-related benefits, then shared those names with other agencies, lawyers for the coalition said.

The lawyers, representing 24 AIDS assistance groups in the Boston area, said they planned to seek a court order today to prevent the auditors for the department's Inspector General's Office from obtaining any more personal records.

"This completely undercuts 15 years of confidentiality and privacy to get people into the system," said

Denise McWilliams, director of the Boston AIDS Consortium.

"At all times, doctors, nurses, service providers have said, 'We will treat you and no one will find out.' This calls into question people's ability to get that assurance," she told the Boston Globe.

The Inspector General's Office said its auditors acted within their authority and could not check on the use of federal funds without seeing records that showed those getting the services actually had AIDS.

The department in 1994 picked Boston as the first metropolitan area to be audited for use of federal funds given to service agencies under the Ryan White CARE Act.

The Boston audit ended, but the agency now is auditing New York and plans to audit Miami, Chicago and Philadelphia, and could resume auditing in Boston.

Joseph Vengrin, an assistant deputy inspector general, told the New York Times that recipients of the federal AIDS money in New York City have not resisted disclosing their files.

In the Boston area, the auditors found that in 102 of 113 cases examined, a service provider did not have documentation that the clients actually tested positive for HIV, the virus that causes the disease, or AIDS.

Richard Stevens, director of public health AIDS services for Boston, said he refused to comply with the auditors' request for information about each client's HIV status.

"Action such as yours jeopardizes the entire service delivery system and its integrity with regard to providing confidential services," Stevens wrote to the audit manager.

He said the intrusion could be deastating to service providers who get CARE money.

Warren Buckingham, deputy director of HIV Services, said Tuesday that fraud had not been a problem with CARE money.

"It's hard to imagine a situation in which a person would pretend to have HIV," he said.

Members of the coalition, who provide such benefits as housing, food and transportation, said they support the department's goal of making certain that only people infected with HIV, the virus that causes AIDS, benefit from the federal funds.

They said that could be done without breaching confidentiality by using codes to identify aid recipients.

It's hard to imagine a situation in which a person would pretend to have HIV.

Cat sluggers shock WSU in nightcap

Shana Newell

To prove how good a team is, it needs to beat quality competition.

For the second time this season, the K-State baseball team has defeated a Top 25 team.

In the nightcap of a doubleheader Tuesday night, the Wildcats jumped out to an 8-1 lead over No. 3 Wichita State and held on to claim a 9-7 victory.

"It feels great to beat a quality ballclub," Coach Mike Clark said. "Especially when you beat the No. 3 team in the nation. It was really big for the kids to prove they could do it."

In a game that lasted 3 hours and 23 minutes, K-State went through four pitchers. Freshman Jason Wells earned his first win of the season. Wells, now 1-0 with a 6.10 ERA, pitched one inning of no-hit baseball. Closer David Johnson saved the game after Mickey Blount pitched 2.2 innings and gave up one run. It was Johnson's third save of the season.

Scott Poepard, Todd Fereday and Frank Gappa all knocked in two runs for the Cats, and slugger David Hendrix added a seventh.

It was the first time K-State has beaten Wichita State since April 16, 1992 in Wichita. The Shockers had won 13 straight games against the Cats until Tuesday's loss.

K-State started its scoring down 1-0 in the third inning on singles by Adam Green and Heath Schesser. An error by the Shockers' hurler allowed Chris Hess to reach first and scored Green.

Fereday grounded out to second base but knocked in Schesser. Hendrix singled to bring Hess across the plate and advanced to second on a single by Poepard. Out No. 2 came when Jason Bichelmeyer struck out looking.

Gappa singled to center field, and Hendrix tried to score from second but was tagged out at the plate by a long throw from the center fielder to catcher. K-State ended the inning ahead 3-1.

Starting pitcher Jon Oiseth held the Shockers at one to allow the Cats' bats to come to the plate again in the fourth. K-State put up five runs in the fourth to go ahead 8-1.

With two outs and a man on first and third, Fereday singled, allowing Green to score. Hendrix was hit by a pitch and advanced the runners.

Poepard came to bat and knocked in two RBI on a single while advancing Hendrix to third. Bichelmeyer was walked, loading the bases for Frank Gappa, who then singled and drove in his two runs before Paul Cranford flied out to center field to

Miller quits baseball

Shana Newell
sports editor

When the K-State baseball team headed to Wichita for a doubleheader, it was short one player — reserve catcher Matt Miller.

It was not illness or injury that kept Miller in Manhattan, nor was it an academic or disciplinary reason.

According to Coach Mike Clark, Miller left simply because baseball was no longer fun for the senior.

"He had one year (last season) where he played only a month and a half of baseball," Clark said. "In the meantime, kids he played with when they were sophomores and freshmen kept working at it and getting better."

And better they got.

The designated hitter for the Cats in the 1994 season, Miller was replaced in 1995 by David Hendrix while the two-sport athlete Miller was participating in spring football.

After a championship 1996 football season, Miller returned to the K-State dugout only to find he wasn't on the day-to-day lineup.

"It was tough not putting him in the lineup," Clark said. "I think it stopped being fun for him. I could see that it had. He worked hard to be there. I think he worked harder than a lot of the guys."

Miller left the team with a .211 batting average in 19 at bats. He had only 4 hits in his turns at the plate, including one double and three RBI.

Clark said he suspected Miller was frustrated with the amount of playing time he had been receiving and with his performances when he did play, but that Clark had not expected Miller to quit the team.

"We were tickled to have him there," Clark said. "Matt and I have been through a lot together in the last three years. He's a great, great kid. It's tough to be a two-sport athlete at this level. I don't know of any other kid that could have handled it like Matt did."

Clark said although he was disappointed Miller left, he knows Miller did what he thought was best.

"He has other avenues he felt he should be exploring. Matt has left his mark at Kansas State in baseball and in football," Clark said. "I'm proud to say I coached him. He's going to be a winner in whatever he does."

Miller was unavailable for comment.

Introducing K-State's new

VOICE OF THE WILDCATS

With the resignation of Mitch Holthus, Greg Sharpe has found that dreams really do come true

by John Berggren

With Mitch Holthus stepping down as the "Voice of the Wildcats" March 5, Cat fans were left reeling with wonder about who would fill his famed position.

Al Lobeck, general manager of the Wildcat Sports Network, made the announcement last Wednesday, naming Greg Sharpe as the new voice.

Sharpe is not new to the Wildcat Sports Network. He started on the network as the football statistician in 1985. He was the network's football sideline reporter in 1987-88, served as the basketball color commentator in 1988-89 and 1995-96 and has filled in for Holthus doing play-by-play numerous times in the '90s.

Along with the Wildcat Sports Network, Sharpe is also the sports anchor for WIBW-TV and is host of WIBW Radio Sports Talk.

With all Sharpe's experience, even Holthus said Sharpe would be a great replacement.

"I think he would be a natural for the job," Holthus said. "He has worked alongside with me doing color and has even filled in for me on play-by-play. He's got my vote for the new replacement."

Holthus told Sharpe he would be a great replacement.

"Mitch said this was a great time for all of this to happen," Sharpe said. "It's perfect since we're moving into the Big 12 conference, and we're also having a new play-by-play announcer."

"It's an honor for me to come into a program with one of the premier football programs in the nation and a basketball team that I believe is on the rise."

Sharpe, a 1986 graduate of K-State, said he was excited about his appointment.

"I was thrilled to death," Sharpe said. "Ever since I first walked onto the campus, I had a dream to someday be the play-by-play announcer for the Wildcats."

"I've hung around the area in hopes that someday the job would open up, and I would have a shot at it."

"This is a great career move for me. So many people who have had this position have turned into some of the greats of all time, like Fred White for the Kansas City Royals and now Mitch Holthus for the Kansas City Chiefs."

With Holthus' resignation, Sharpe said he knew he had a good chance at the job.

"I knew when Mitch stepped down, I had a shot at the job," Sharpe said.

"I've stayed with WIBW for the reason that someday I might get the job. I didn't know who would be the number one choice for the job, but I felt like I was a prime candidate."

Being a K-State graduate didn't hurt him when getting accepted for the job, Sharpe said.

"In looking at the history, it sure helps to be a K-Stater," Sharpe said. "I've worked with Stan Webber, and we know each other. I know the coaches, and I know the Big 8."

Sharpe said he wasn't intimidated by what will be expected of him as the new voice.

"I know I'm stepping into some big shoes, but I can't put that kind of pressure on myself. Mitch is a good friend of mine, and he took me under his wing. Now I think I'm prepared for the job."

"Since getting the job my datebook has started filling up fast," he said. "I'm going to keep doing the things that Mitch did with the Junior Wildcat Club, and I'll be talking to Wildcat Booster Clubs. Even though it's the off season I'm getting pretty busy."

"I'm really looking forward to meeting new people. I don't think I'm real well-known to people in western Kansas and in Nebraska, and I think it will be fun to get out and meet them," he said.

With all the work that comes with the job, Sharpe said he wasn't afraid of the burn-out that eventually took its toll on Holthus.

"I do fear burn-out a little bit, but I'm not in the same situation as Mitch was. I don't have the family situation that Mitch had. I'm just recently married, and I have no plans for another broadcast job."

It seems the only thing Sharpe is lacking that Holthus had is a catchphrase, but even Holthus didn't have one when he came into the business.

"Mitch didn't start his 'Bigs' until the end of the 1988 basketball season. I don't have his trademark saying, but I will. It will probably be something spontaneous and exciting. If people like it, it might catch on. For now, I'm just going to make my broadcasts informative and just do the basics."

Maybe the loss of Holthus wasn't as big, big, big as everyone thinks.

► SPRING FOOTBALL

Snyder expecting fight at quarterback; Kavanagh, Vidricksen lead spring roster

Shana Newell
sports editor

As the first season of the Big 12 conference dawns, K-State fans are once again finding themselves wondering who will lead the Wildcats into battle.

The obvious choice is senior Brian Kavanagh — 1995 Holiday Bowl Most Valuable Player. But battling hard for the position is Cody Lee Smith.

"He's been running and doing all the things we do in the out of season program, so he's one of the guys now. When we put pads on, he should be ready to go," Coach Bill Snyder said of the highly recruited player.

Smith was recruited last year from Mount San Antonio Junior College in California. Snyder had expected him to start last season, but Smith developed a stomach ailment that has been most recently diagnosed as Rumination Syndrome. The illness left him throwing up as many as 40 times a day.

"There's still some lingering effects, but overall he's doing quite well. First of all, Cody came in here quite heavy. So, there's some good that comes out of that," Snyder said. "I wouldn't want anyone to go through that to lose weight, but he's under 200 pounds right now. That's a considerable loss for him, and he's a little light right now."

Unless the NCAA grants Smith another year because of a medical hardship, this will be Smith's final season. If the medical hardship year is granted, Kavanagh's and Smith's seasons would be staggered and Snyder said that would be good.

Kavanagh is listed as the starting quarterback on the two-deep roster.

Snyder said he expects Kavanagh to perform at the level he did in San Diego.

"I have to envision him based on what I've seen each our system remains to be seen."

One other quarterback looking to impress the coaches will be freshman recruit Jonathan Beasley. Beasley is 6 feet 2 inches, 220 pounds and is from Cactus High School in Glendale, Ariz.

Other young quarterbacks are sophomores Todd Miller, J.W. Wight and Lamar Chapman.

'Oh, Baby,' Griffey for U.S. president?

■ Hockey, basketball, baseball, football and even wrestling. Did I miss anything?

With the basketball season at an end, baseball underway and the football season just a few short weeks away, I have had a lot of time to do some thinking. Nothing profound, just random thoughts.

■ I recently went to a Kansas City Blades hockey game, and I was amazed to see little children cheering for fights.

As the hockey players went after each other, the referees stood by and watched as entertained fans cheered for more. I was informed that these fights weren't even good ones, since no blood was drawn. And people think television is violent.

■ Congratulations goes out to Kentucky coach Rick Pitino and his Wildcats for winning the NCAA National Championship. I have two questions for him, though.

While attending the press conference before the game, Pitino started talking about how he was on his honeymoon when Jim Boeheim, now coach of the Syracuse Orangemen, called Pitino and asked him to come work for Boeheim.

It was a touching story, but was it necessary for the press conference?

And one more thought on Pitino, how much gel does he put in his hair? If he leans against anything, does he leave a hair print? Just a random thought.

■ The National Hockey League is great, despite the strike. And, it was nice to see the FOX network broadcasting the games. But why use the hockey puck that lights up? I understand it is hard to follow the puck, but it is almost impossible to follow along with the lit-up puck. It looks like one blur going across the screen.

I know FOX was only trying to help, but leave the puck alone, and trust that I can follow along.

■ Speaking of television, this year all the post-season games for Major League Baseball will be televised. How thoughtful. Maybe we'll even have a whole season this year.

■ Since baseball is back in full swing, pay attention to all the free things you can get by going to the games. You can even get specially-priced tickets.

Baseball is a great game, and we are fortunate that we live so close to Kansas City and the Royals because Kauffman Stadium is state-of-the-art. General admission tickets are only $5, too.

■ If you want to see players who play for the love of the game and not for the money, though, check out our own K-State baseball team.

The Wildcats are 18-10, and we even received votes last week to be ranked. If you're staying in town this weekend, check out the Cats. They'll be playing host to Missouri.

■ It's hard to believe that football is almost here. The 1995 Holiday Bowl Champions are in action on April 27 at Wagner Field. It's a great chance to come out and see the 1996 Cats scrimmage, as they start on their road to their fourth consecutive bowl game.

■ And it's not too early to plan for the fall football games either. Tickets for the K-State vs. Kansas game, which will be on Nov. 9 in Lawrence, can be ordered at the Bramlage ticket office. The price is $35, and there is a limit of four. Start planning your trip to see the Cats try to beat Kansas for the fourth time in a row.

■ During spring break, the NCAA Wrestling Championship was in Minnesota. In my home state of Iowa, wrestling is a big thing. In fact, the University took first place in the championship.

It makes me wish K-State still had a Division I wrestling program. After all, there are good teams in the Big 8 in Iowa State, Oklahoma State and

Myview

CHRIS
May

Nebraska, to name a few.

■ Let's all be thankful that the basketball season is through for at least one reason: Dick Vitale. We won't have to listen to "Oh, baby," for at least a little while.

■ And one last random thought with this being an election year.

Are people really taking the Nike ad that recommends Ken Griffey Jr. for president seriously?

Voters in California used Griffey for their write-in choice. Is baseball making a comeback?

end the inning.

"We knew we could stay competitive with them. We've done it twice before," Clark said.

"We just needed to finish a game off. It was important for our team to close out a game."

The difference between the first and the second games of the double-header was the way the team played, he said.

The Cats were aggressive on the basepaths in the first game and were caught either stealing or leading off five times. Those were crucial outs for the Cats who needed runners on base.

During the break, Clark said he told the Cats to refocus.

"We had to refocus between games. I told them to do what needs to be done and not try to do the things that don't need to be done," he said.

"I told them they needed to be smart baseball players."

The Cats return to Frank Myers Field for a five-game home stand beginning with a weekend series against Missouri on Friday.

Standoff continues between Japan, U.S.

► Standoff over land leases for military bases may cause tension if unresolved by the time President Clinton visits Japan.

Associated Press

TOKYO — Angry landowners. Lawsuits over jet fighter noise. Outrage over crimes by U.S. servicemen.

Though often described as one of the closest security relationships in the world, Japan's military ties with the United States are coming under some heavy fire.

And with a visit by President Clinton fast approaching, leaders here are beginning to worry.

Prime Minister Ryutaro Hashimoto acknowledges that if the current standoff over land leases for military bases on the southern islands of Okinawa is not settled soon, it could sour Clinton's April 16-18 visit.

The latest round of hand-wringing was prompted by the campaign of Shoichi Chibana, an Okinawan grocery store owner who wants to evict the U.S. Navy from a patch of land he owns.

Coming less than a month after three American servicemen were convicted of raping a 12-year-old girl on Okinawa last fall, Chibana's anti-military rallying cry has struck a sympathetic chord with many Okinawans, whose islands host nearly 30,000 U.S. troops.

The timing of his lawsuit to evict the Navy also added to its impact. Monday was the 51st anniversary of the Battle of Okinawa, one of World War II's bloodiest. Chibana's grandfather died defending the plot of land during the 1945 invasion.

"This is a commemoration for him," Chibana said before filing the lawsuit at the Naha District Court, which has not yet set a ruling date.

Afraid of protests, officials mobilized hundreds of riot police to keep Chibana and his supporters off the base. Scenes of police turning him away were broadcast nationwide, and the story was front-page news in most major newspapers on Tuesday, as the standoff continued.

"The authorities must act scrupulously and cool-headedly to prevent the situation from turning violent," Japan's largest newspaper, the Yomiuri, urged in an editorial Tuesday.

The government has not ruled out allowing Chibana back on his land — temporarily.

"The path isn't completely closed," Seiroku Kajiyama, the administration's chief spokesman, said Tuesday.

Along with its emotional appeal, Chibana's case has a solid legal basis.

The lease on his 2,500-square-foot patch of land on the grounds of a U.S. Navy communications center expired Sunday at midnight.

Until the special committee on Okinawa approves the government's request for an emergency six-month extension, the Navy is technically trespassing.

The committee is scheduled to begin deliberations on Friday.

Even if the government resolves the current mess, however, several more loom on the horizon:

■ Lawyers in Tokyo are preparing a class-action lawsuit against the Japanese and U.S. governments over the noise caused by aircraft at Yokota Air Base, on the outskirts of Tokyo. Japanese courts have already awarded residents near U.S. bases damages in similar cases.

■ Police on Okinawa are still searching for a white man and a black man suspected in two more rapes, both committed at knifepoint. U.S. military officials stress there is no proof that either assailant is in the service.

But the conduct of the troops on Okinawa has come under intense scrutiny since the September rape. If a U.S. soldier is arrested in either case, there would be a huge outcry.

U.S. and Japanese negotiators have been considering plans to shift U.S. bases away from Okinawa since the September rape, and some sort of announcement is expected during Clinton's visit.

But there remains an unbridged gap between leaders on Okinawa — who are seeking the U.S. troops' complete removal over the next 20 years — and Washington and Tokyo, which want no major changes.

And unless the Clinton visit produces some progress, that gap could grow even wider.

Though the number of Okinawa landowners contesting the lease renewals is relatively small — fewer than 3,000 of the 32,000 who own land used by the U.S. military — they hold about 10 percent of the base land.

Contracts with nearly three dozen of the landowners are due to expire in May 1997, and the central government's handling of the Chibana standoff — which has been widely panned by Japanese news media — could prompt even more opposition.

According to a survey done by the Mainichi, another major newspaper, several Okinawan cities and towns where bases are located may contest the lease renewals.

In possibly the most important case, the mayor of Naha, Okinawa's capital, told the Mainichi that he does not intend to renew a lease expiring next May for a port now used by the U.S. military.

The mayor of Okinawa City will also reportedly try to block the renewal of leases that begin expiring in four years for city land used for Kadena Air Base, one of the largest Air Force installations outside the United States.

L.A. police brutality draws FBI investigation

Associated Press

LOS ANGELES — With a crush of reporters pressing her for answers, Leticia Gonzalez held her head and wept quietly, saying little about the videotaped beating she and another Mexican got from two sheriff's deputies.

Gonzalez was released Tuesday into the custody of her lawyer, David Ross, and appeared at a news conference with bruises on her arms and shoulders.

Gonzalez, 32, of Xocheca, Mexico, and a man were beaten Monday after a high-speed highway chase in a pickup that was crammed with other Mexicans suspected of sneaking over the border.

"She told me, 'All I know is, when I came out of the car, I said, 'Yo soy aqui,' which means I'm here. 'He grabbed me by the hair, pulled me down, and started to hit me,'" Ross said.

Gonzalez had a scab on her lip. Ross said was from being hit in the face during the 15-second beating by two Riverside County sheriff's deputies.

Ross said Gonzalez, who had crossed the border seeking a job, told him she felt like someone was trying to kill her.

He said she had no relatives in the United States.

Border Patrol agents had spotted the pickup truck on a road commonly used to get around an immigration checkpoint.

During the 70-mile chase, the pickup reached speeds of 100 mph, its shabby camper top disintegrating in the wind to reveal those inside.

It finally stopped on the side of the highway and the passengers scrambled away. Police said 19 of them, not all, were soon captured.

TV news helicopters videotaped the chase and beating, and the footage was played repeatedly in the United States and Mexico.

One deputy, holding his baton like a baseball bat, was videotaped clubbing the man on the back and shoulders with a baton, even as he fell face down on the ground.

The Riverside County Sheriff's Department identified the man as Andrian Flores Martinez, 26.

When Gonzalez clambered out the truck window, apparently because the passenger-side door was stuck, the same deputy beat her on the back with the baton, shoved her face into the pickup truck's hood, then grabbed her by the hair and pulled her to the ground.

At least one other deputy struck her with his baton.

Neither Gonzalez nor Martinez appeared to resist or attempt to get away.

Martinez, who was hospitalized briefly for bruises and a possible broken elbow, was turned over to the Immigration and Naturalization Service, said Lori Marquette, the sheriff's department senior deputy.

The INS also took custody of the others who were captured.

The deputies, who are white, were suspended with pay.

Tracy Watson is a five-year veteran; Kurtis Franklin, a 20-year veteran.

The FBI opened a civil rights investigation Tuesday, and the Riverside County and Los Angeles County sheriff's departments began their own probes.

Mexico's Department of Foreign Relations filed a formal protest with the State Department.

President Clinton expressed concern, White House press secretary Mike McCurry said.

MUSIC REVIEW

'Pilots' get lost in lack of power, obscure lyrics

Bill Bontempo
staff writer

Since signing with the Atlantic Recording Corporation in 1992, Stone Temple Pilots have recorded three full studio albums.

Their third product, "Tiny Music ... Songs From the Vatican Gift Shop," reveals some of what might be wrong with the record industry today, but the ideas are lost somewhere between a sound that seems uncomfortable to the band and the obscure lyrics on the album.

Stone Temple Pilots were initially lauded for sounding like Pearl Jam on their first two albums. However, their sound was even more marketable for the pop audience.

With the third album, the band seems to be trying to lose the label of sound-alikes by toning the music down even more and changing Scott Weiland's vocal delivery.

The result is a Nirvana-like sound of the '80s, only with more interesting lyrics, which means you must look for deeper meanings.

"And So I Know," includes "campfire girls make me feel alright," which makes you wonder if there is something else in those Girl Scout cookies.

"Pass the Umbilical cord down for this fly/Take a sneak while the model she earns it," from the track "Seven Caged Tigers" is another example of strange lyrical prose heard throughout the record.

The music in "And So I Know" and "Seven Caged Tigers," shows the versatility and talent of the band. This might not always be a good thing. In "And So I Know," it sounds more like it belongs more on a late Beach Boys album than anything made in this decade.

"Tripping a Hole in a Paper Heart," is one track sounding somewhat like the Stone Temple Pilots of their first two albums, but it lacks the punch of powerful refrains and heavy guitar overtones.

The lyrics in many songs refer to feelings of discontent with celebrity status, which is not a new theme for newer bands who are suffering the effects of overnight stardom. Oh, pity the life of the famous.

"Just because you're so cliched/It don't mean you won't get paid," from "Ride the Cliche," "sell more records if I'm dead ... hope it's near corporate records' fiscal year" from "Adhesive" and "sell your soul and sign an autograph," from "Big Bang Baby," are all good examples of how the strife of being a big rock star has permeated the band's writing and the theme of the album.

If one track on the album can be considered impressive however, it is "Adhesive," which captures the feelings of the band. The use of horns, along with a solid drum sound, creates an almost Pink Floydish feel and a melodramatic twist that emphasizes the theme of angst.

The inclusion of the short musical pieces "Press Play" and "Daisy" are interesting. Both are good musically but extremely out of the genre, making them sound as if they should be in a different band's entourage.

"Daisy" could easily be the background music for an American Express Card commercial, urging the listener to envision lazy beachside strolls in the Caribbean.

"Tiny Music ... Songs From the Vatican Gift Shop," is good listening at the I-Station for those who enjoy interesting writing and inventive sounds, but Stone Temple Pilots fans will no doubt have to wait for the next effort from the band before they find a new favorite song.

services on campus are going to be a real priority with our campaign," said Hansen, who supports public teacher evaluations.

While issues like Lafene Health Center fees and raising athletic fees are still on the students' minds, Hansen said he hopes those aren't the issues they think about when the voting begins.

"Well, one of the ironic things about this election is how things like Lafene and the Board of Student Publications, etc. are so huge right now, but ironically enough, they will have nothing to do with the next term's president," Hansen said. "One of the worst things that could happen in the next week is that we spend the whole time talking about Lafene or the athletic fee. We need to think about the new issues, like teacher evaluations."

It is Otto's experience in Senate the past three years the duo will rely on to weather the coming term if elected.

"After we're elected, it's going to be using my experience to work together to bring us together," Otto said. "We will need to build coalitions instead of one side bucking the other and back and forth and constant tugging back and forth."

istration and the other to represent the faculty.

Muir said as faculty senate representative he tries not to make the difference in votes regarding important student fees, but on other issues, he will. In all matters in Senate though, Muir said he tries to be objective.

"We try to take in everybody's viewpoint," he said.

Other members of Senate are the 25 interns, selected by an application interview process. "They're the voice of the freshman class," Wendy Strevey, intern coordinator, said.

Student Senate interns are appointed at the beginning of each school year, giving incoming freshman who could not be a part of elections a chance to be involved in the legislative process.

Interns do not have a vote in Senate, but they carry all the other duties of senators, including proposing legislation.

"Probably 50 percent of interns run for Senate the next year," she said.

There are 57 Senate seats open for this year's election.

plane, the Riggs National Bank of Washington said. "We have been told that the crash left no survivors." Croatian TV also said all aboard the T-43 passenger jet were killed.

Word of the crash stunned Washington and brought an outpouring of prayers and praise for Brown and his entourage, who were on a mission to find ways to rebuild the war-torn Balkan region's infrastructure and economy.

"To all of their loved ones and their families and friends, I want to say that I am very grateful for their lives and their service," Clinton said in brief remarks to about 700 Commerce Department workers, pausing at the end for a moment of silence.

Vice President Al Gore, first lady Hillary Rodham Clinton and most of the Cabinet sat solemnly at the ceremony, most of them staring down at the auditorium stage.

"He was one of the best advisers and ablest people I ever knew," Clinton said of Brown, who as Democratic National Committee chairman was a major figure in the president's 1992 campaign victory.

"Those of us who loved him will always be grateful for his friendship and his warmth."

Clinton's use of the past tense hours before any fatalities were confirmed reflected the pessimism in Washington that any good news would come from rescue teams at the hillside where Croatian officials found the downed plane.

The mood was much the same among the parade of elected officials and other dignitaries who called on Brown's wife of 33 years, Alma, at the family's Washington home.

"This is a man whose multiple talents will not be easily replaced," said Eleanor Holmes Norton, the District of Columbia's delegate to Congress. "For the African American community, the loss is into infinity."

For all the mournful talk, the White House and the Pentagon said they could not confirm any fatalities because American rescue teams were having difficulty reaching the site.

But, speaking privately, several administration officials said that as the hours dragged on, there was little hope for survivors.

in mathematics from the University of Michigan. After quitting Berkeley, Kaczynski lived in Utah in the late 1970s and early 1980s where he did odd jobs and menial labor, this official said.

He bought land in Montana 10-12 years ago and has been building a house-cabin there since then, the official said.

Members of the man's family found some old writings of his while cleaning out a place where he once lived in Chicago, and the writings raised their suspicions, said two federal officials speaking on condition of anonymity.

The family approached an attorney in Washington, who called the FBI to alert them.

Federal agents later got consent to search the former Chicago residence, the officials said.

The Unabomber's spree began at Northwestern University outside Chicago in May 1978.

Three people have died and 23 more were injured in 15 subsequent Unabomber attacks; the most recent came April 24, 1995, when a timber industry executive was killed in Sacramento, Calif. The FBI has spread copies of the Unabomber's writings throughout the academic community in hopes of finding someone who recognizes the work.

Last September, the New York Times and the Washington Post published, in the Post, his 35,000-word treatise on the inhumanity of industrial society after he promised to stop planting bombs that kill people. There have been no such incidents since then.

Unabomber suspect charged

Associated Press

HELENA, Mont. — Investigators found a partially assembled pipe bomb, chemicals and meticulous notes on making explosives in the mountain cabin of the former Berkeley math professor suspected of being the Unabomber, federal officials said Thursday.

Theodore John Kaczynski, 53, was charged Thursday with possessing the bomb components and was held without bail. Appearing before a judge, Kaczynski, bearded and thin, said he was mentally competent and couldn't afford his own lawyer.

The charge made no mention of the Unabomber's string of bombing attacks, which killed three people and injured 23 in 18 years.

Federal officials said the charge was designed to hold Kaczynski while agents build a case.

The FBI again searched Kaczynski's hand-built, 10-by-12-foot cabin Thursday. Federal officials said the search could last several days.

"It's going very slowly, because we're not sure if it's booby-trapped," said a federal agent speaking on condition of anonymity. "We have an explosives ordinance team X-raying everything before we touch it."

FBI agents had been staking out Kaczynski's cabin near the Continental Divide for several weeks, ever since his own mother and brother in the Chicago area notified authorities that they had stumbled across some of his old writings while cleaning out the house they were putting up for sale and found them similar to the Unabomber's anarchist manifestos.

Kaczynski was taken into custody by federal agents Wednesday so they could search his cabin in the wilderness 50 miles northwest of Helena.

A key question went unanswered: How could Kaczynski, described by neighbors as going everywhere on foot or on an old bicycle, have mailed bombs from locations including San Francisco, Oakland, Calif., Sacramento, Calif., and Chicago? Other bombs were left in cities around the country.

Dick Lundberg, a neighbor, said he sometimes gave Kaczynski rides into Helena. Plane connections were available there.

Asked about the possibility of accomplices, one federal agent said, "This guy is a loner. He wouldn't work with someone else."

A federal grand jury is scheduled to convene April 17 in Great Falls and will decide whether to hand down an indictment in the case, a federal law enforcement official said on condition of anonymity.

PLANE CRASH

U.S. grieves for victims

Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A stunned capital was in mourning today. Flags flew at half-staff, and grief hung over the Commerce Department on a sunny spring day that should have held the promise of new life.

The bodies of Commerce Secretary Ron Brown and his entire entourage had been found, recovered from a plane crash in Croatia on Wednesday.

At the Pentagon, Air Force Lt. Gen. Howell Estes III said search crews were trying to determine the number of people on the plane. A passenger list for the flight showed 33 Americans and two Croatians, but as of today only 33 bodies had been recovered.

Estes said the plane, an Air Force version of the Boeing 737, was making an instrument landing when it apparently veered off course and into the 2,300-foot hillside.

The Air Force said in a statement that the 23-year-old plane was not equipped with a black box flight data recorder, unlike commercial planes and most Air Force planes used to carry VIPs and other passengers.

The T-43 aircraft that crashed 1.8 miles north of the runway at the airport near Dubrovnik was the same plane used earlier this week to shuttle Defense Secretary William Perry and, last week, Mrs. Clinton through Bosnia.

Students try relaxed campaign

Cowdogg, Rader to appear on ballot for presidential election

Scott M. Ladd
staff reporter

If elected, two candidates want to bring a friendly approach and establish open lines of communication with student government.

But don't look for them using their birth names on the presidential/vice-presidential ballot.

Instead Shane Cowan, junior in food and nutrition and student body president candidate, and Brian Rader, junior in journalism and mass communications and student body vice president candidate, will appear on the ballot as Cowdogg and Rader.

"It's kind of like part of our platform," Cowan said. "We're kind of personal people, and we want our relationship with the student body to be that way. No one knows me by my first name, really. Everyone just calls me Cowdogg."

There's a second purpose to the nickname usage, Cowan said.

"We also wanted to let people know that we weren't uptight like members of the current Senate are," he said. "We think people are fed up with the straight-laced approach in Senate right now. We're going to be a breath of air with our relaxed campaign."

Cowan's words were echoed by his running mate.

"Sure, the issues may be serious, but we're definitely laid back," Rader said. "We want to have people get out and realize there is a government on campus and that they are a part of it."

Alleged Freeman checks found in Kansas

Associated Press

OSKALOOSA — Phony checks bearing the name of a member of the rebel Freeman group involved in a standoff with federal authorities in Montana have been passed in Kansas, authorities said.

Checks bearing the name of LeRoy M. Schweitzer were passed in northeast Kansas before Schweitzer's arrest last week, according to Jefferson County attorney Dan Owen.

The checks have been used for goods and services for several months, primarily in Jefferson, Jackson and Pottawatomie counties, Owen said.

Owen said those fake documents — identified variously as "lien drafts," "comptroller warrants" and "certified banker's checks" — aren't drawn on any particular bank.

"They're drawn instead to the U.S. Treasury or the so-called 'comptroller of currency,' to someone who won't cash them," Owen said. "Basically they're just worthless pieces of paper made to look like checks."

The documents vary from being quite sophisticated to looking like something a child would produce, Owen said.

He said many of the checks are signed in the lower right-hand corner by Schweitzer.

"That's your first clue," he said. "If somebody gives you a check signed by LeRoy Schweitzer, you'd better think twice."

Owen said another alleged Freeman check scam involves cases in which a bank account has been closed but the person who formerly held the account still has some of its blank checks.

Two of the principals named in the indictments are Schweitzer and Daniel E. Petersen. Both were arrested by the FBI last week and charged with fraud and threatening public officials.

Others accused of conspiring to defraud the government remained jailed Thursday at a ranch outside Jordan, Mont., surrounded by a blockade of federal agents and state highway patrol officers.

Authorities think the Freeman and the bad checks might be linked to a Kansas militia-like group that claims to have established a separate new government.

The local group is known as, among other things, the "State in Fact" and "the united states of America."

In September, the group published a proclamation in a Topeka newspaper that it was establishing a separate new government taking its power from Holy Scriptures and the original handwritten Constitution for the state of Kansas, written in 1859.

The proclamation said members wouldn't recognize the authority of state and federal courts over their alternative government, which set up its own court system. Frederick J. Wilbur was designated "Supreme Court Justice of Jefferson County."

Wilbur, 60, was arrested last week after a 28-hour standoff at his home in connection with two felony charges of aggravated assault.

Authorities allege Wilbur fired gunshots at two boys from his farmhouse as they drove an all-terrain vehicle on a county road.

MAD COW DISEASE

Possible disease link generates consumer worrying, boycotting

AbdulNaser T. Abdullah
staff reporter

Consumers across the world are boycotting beef after hearing about mad cow disease.

Fears that the disease could affect people around the globe spread after an advisory committee told the British government there could be a link between cattle killer bovine spongiform encephalopathy (BSE) and its human equivalent, Creutzfeldt-Jakob disease (CJD).

"The link between CJD and British beef is only a hypothesis," David Van Metre, assistant professor of veterinary medicine, said.

The committee became concerned after identifying 10 cases of CJD where the patients were younger than normal.

After reviewing the patients' medical histories, genetic analysis and consideration of other possible causes for CJD, the committee found no adequate explanation for these cases.

The committee concluded that although there was no direct scientific evidence of a link between BSE and CJD, the most likely explanation at present is that these cases are linked to exposure of BSE.

"No scientific proof exists to verify that humans can develop CJD from eating beef," Van Metre said.

Van Metre said the British doctors simply could not explain the development of CJD in those 10 people by any other cause and hypothesized that these people were exposed to BSE-infected beef a decade or more ago.

BSE was first diagnosed in 1986. Scientists believe it has spread to cattle through feed enriched with sheep organs.

The incurable disease is a slowly progressing degenerative disease affecting the central nervous system of cattle.

Symptoms of the human variant, CJD, include mental deterioration, slurred speech and walking difficulties. The symptoms get progressively worse until death.

No case of BSE has ever been diagnosed in the United States.

The U.S. Drug Association has a policy to be proactive and preventive towards BSE. As BSE is not known to exist in the United States, the measures taken have been in surveillance, prevention and education.

Import restrictions on cattle from BSE-infected countries have been in place since 1989.

Active surveillance efforts for BSE began in 1990.

The United States has not imported beef from Great Britain since 1985.

In Europe, opinions have been strong toward mad cow disease.

Germany called for a ban on British beef throughout the 15-nation European Community to prevent possible spreading of the disease.

France announced a new brand mark of meat made in France, because France is one of the leading importers of British meat. In Italy, opinion polls show that 35 percent of Italians had switched to chicken and pork, away from beef.

► CNS DIRECTOR ANNOUNCES RESIGNATION AFTER 3 YEARS AT KSU

There will be a new director of Computing and Network Services beginning this summer.

K-State's current director of CNS, John Bucher, announced his resignation recently and will be moving on to a similar position at Oberlin College in Ohio.

"We will certainly miss him here," said Ken Conrow, associate director for CNS.

Tony Donnelly, assistant director for CNS, said Bucher always listens to what his colleagues have to say. "He is a super individual to work with," Donnelly said.

At Oberlin College, Bucher will have similar administrative responsibilities that include overseeing the computing systems, payroll and budgeting, he said.

"It was the right professional decision at the right time," Bucher said about the move to the smaller, prestigious liberal arts college. "I'll miss the football team at K-State most of all."

Bucher has developed a national reputation giving lectures on computer services and doing various computer consulting, Conrow said.

"I plan to continue when I'm invited," Bucher said. However, he said he generally uses vacation time to do those engagements.

Bucher has spent his last three years at K-State and assisted with moving CNS from the basement of Cardwell Hall to the current location in Nichols Hall, Conrow said.

As director of CNS at K-State, Bucher has been responsible for oversight of the central computing systems at K-State, he said.

During his time at K-State Bucher has been involved with implementing the human resource systems and developing Farrell Library's new Voyager computer system.

Before coming to K-State Bucher spent six years at the University of South Dakota as the director of computer services, he said.

A new director of CNS has not yet been named, Donnelly said.

► AIDS VICTIMS' QUILT TOURS COUNTRY, VISITS K-STATE IN NOVEMBER

Students will get the opportunity next fall to view quilt patches from an AIDS victim quilt that is touring the country.

The display will be in the Union Art Gallery the last week of November during World AIDS Day.

Senators voted to allocate $517.30 to STD HIV AIDS Peer Educators to allow for the expenses of bringing the quilt pieces to campus.

"SHAPE cannot afford to bring in the full quilt, so they've sent in certain amounts of panels. So it will be four or five panels that will be actually sent instead of the 30 or 40 panels in the entire quilt," said Kelly Fink, Interim Coordinator of Student Activities.

The original bill did not include money for freight costs because it did not fall under allocations guidelines.

Julie Cates, arts and sciences senator, suggested an amendment to include $165 for freight costs.

Cates viewed the quilt when it was displayed at the Kansas Expocentre in Topeka. She plans to volunteer in Washington, D.C., when the quilt is displayed October 11-12.

► LOCAL STATION BECOMES FOX AFFILIATE, CHANGES PROGRAMMING

For TCI Cable television subscribers, one station just expanded its programming.

Junction City's KTMJ Channel 6 became the 164th FOX affiliate April 1 in hopes of reaching a larger audience.

FOX networks reach more than 95 percent of U.S. homes with televisions.

"It will mainly change our prime time programming," Robert Raff, general manager for KTMJ, said.

Channel 6 had been a UPN network since Jan. 16, 1995, when the station expanded to reach Topeka.

The UPN affiliation brought the Topeka audience "Star Trek: Voyager," "Nowhere Man" and other popular shows.

The station will continue to carry these and other UPN shows, but it will also add such FOX favorites as "Married With Children" and "The Simpsons."

Raff said the FOX affiliation will allow the channel to showcase some high-profile sporting events.

Channel 6 will carry what FOX is dubbing the triple crown of professional sports, which includes the National Hockey League Stanley Cup Finals, Major League Baseball's World Series and the National Football League championship Super Bowl XXXI.

The network will also cover some regular season professional hockey, baseball and football games.

"Beverly Hills 90210," "Party of Five" and "The X-Files" will also be added to the prime-time line up for Channel 6. These FOX programs are highly rated by 18-49 year old viewers.

For the grade-school age audience, the FOX affiliation will add "Bobby's World," "Batman and Robin" and "Power Rangers."

Raff said KTMJ is seeking an FCC license to add a translator device that would allow the station to expand its coverage area into Emporia and the further reaches of northeast Kansas.

SHUTTING THE DOOR ON OPEN ADMISSIONS

Richard Elkins has seen students come to K-State academically unqualified for years. As the director of admissions, he never had to worry about it. Incoming freshmen needed only a high school diploma to be accepted.

Kansas has always maintained an open-door policy for its six regent institutions, the only state in America left with such non-standards.

Secondary curriculum was optional. Grade point averages did not matter. Class standing was irrelevant. Kansans, like Elkins, were accustomed to allowing students open opportunity to continue their education, regardless of past academic performance.

"I think there was a feeling that everyone should have a right to try college," Elkins said. But Elkins said he has a different outlook now.

Many Kansas educators and lawmakers do. "I'm not an elitist," Elkins said, "but seeing students come in with a 10 on their ACT and rank 100 in a class of 101 has changed my thinking."

"They come to the University somewhat thinking they are going to be successful — not that it's impossible. You'll find one out of 100 will do that. But the other 99 will invest time, emotions, money, and in two or three semesters, find themselves on academic dismissal. Now what has happened to them?"

Admissions bill yields passing grade after decade of failure

A sizable percentage — ranging from 25 percent at the University of Kansas to 39 percent at Wichita State University — do not return for a second year.

"That's a pretty terrible figure," Rep. Ralph Tanner, R-Baldwin, said.

Tanner was the principal sponsor of the qualified admissions bill that will require students to meet set requirements before acceptance to Kansas regent institutions.

It's a 10-year-old concept that has failed year after year — until this year.

Gov. Bill Graves signed the bill into law Thursday.

Seventh graders, the first class who will be imposed by the stricter standards, were witnesses to the signing ceremony at Robinson Middle School in Topeka.

Students must meet one of the following requirements before entering one of the six public universities by the year 2001:

- Complete a college preparatory curriculum prescribed by the Kansas Board of Regents with a grade point average of 2.0 on a 4.0 scale.
- Have a composite score of 21 or higher on the American College Testing program.
- Rank in the top one-third of the graduating high school class.

WHAT IF?

Listed below is the breakdown of first-time, non-resident K-State students who would have been ineligible for admission had the bill been in effect in fall 1995.

Total enrolled: 324
Total ineligible: 38
Ineligible minorities: 25
Ineligible athletes: 8
Ineligible internationals: 5

The college preparatory curriculum must include four years of English, three years of math, social studies and science and one year of computer technology.

Applicants who are 21 or older would be exempt.

The admission standards would also carry a 10-percent window for Kansas students who do not meet any of the standards.

A new direction: the push for established standards

Motivation behind qualified admissions ranges from a history of unprepared high school students not yet ready to meet the rigor of college academics to state financial burdens for remedial courses and dropouts.

The state spent about $3,724 per student per semester at K-State for fall 1994, according to Ron Downey, director of institutional research and analysis. The amount includes averages for resident and non-resident, undergraduate and graduate students. The average for the six regent schools was slightly higher.

If just 10 students don't qualify, for example, when the law goes into effect, the state will save more than $70,000 per year at one of six regent institutions.

But lack of evidence showing any student will be turned away under the current conditions of the law leaves number-crunching little validity.

A stronger reason for qualified-admissions support, say some faculty, is having more students show up to class prepared. In an informal survey of 50 faculty, 46 said they favored qualified admissions. "I see a lot of students so poorly prepared that they are unable to keep up regular course work," said Linda Davis, an instructor of biology at K-State for six years. "Some of them are bound to fail for lack of preparation. Some of these students can't use decimals or calculate simple percentages. And some are unable to write a sentence."

Elkins said the emotional and financial cost is too great to allow open admissions. "As I said, there's no absolute way of saying somebody is going to be successful," he said. "But with 100 people, we know that 99 percent, like I described, will not be successful. Do you let 99 fail for one to succeed?" Evelyn Frazier, an instructor of English at K-State for 13 years, said she sees both sides. "Students who aren't qualified are a drag on the system," she said. "But those same students might blossom later, might catch fire. And then we are the ones who look like the losers."

Mike Lynch, assistant vice president for University advancement, who has done research on qualified admissions at K-State, also has mixed views.

"On the good side, it encourages students to take the regents' curriculum," he said. "Students may not like it, but it's to their advantage. The chances for success will be better. But I've been here long enough to where I've seen a lot of students who would not have been eligible for admission walk out of here with a 3.0 or 3.5 grade point average."

Reducing the number of remedial courses at public universities was another factor in the push for qualified admissions.

"One of the ways the bill was sold was by saying there would be less need for remedial education," Leo Schell, professor of elementary education, said. "I personally think the money saved will be minimal."

Rep. Kent Glasscock, R-Manhattan, an opponent of qualified admissions, said he has yet to see evidence that it will be economically efficient.

"A case has never been proven to me that we are going to save money," he said.

K-State, in fact, will spend additional funds in the admissions process.

Before, a Kansas student's transcript needed only to be checked for graduation from high school.

Now, admissions officials will spend time and money checking students' background for proper qualifications.

"Unfortunately, any cost is significant," Elkins said. "We'll have to have more resources or stop doing some of the things we are doing."

Outlook and changes: setting a core curriculum

According to testimony provided for the Senate Committee on Education March 18 by Stephen M. Jordan, executive director for the regents, the parameters of the bill could be changed before implementation.

"While it may not contain all the provisions we may wish to see ... we can, and will, make it work," the testimony stated.

After 10 consecutive years of failure, the bill has been revised numerous times, including lowering the minimal ACT score from 23 to 21.

Under the original bill in 1987, just 7 percent of K-State's freshman class would have qualified.

"It was devastating," Lynch said.

The two-point drop translates to an 18-percent increase in K-State freshmen eligible for admission under the ACT provision.

"My own personal observation is that the idea was to get some bill through," Elkins said.

"Even if it may not be as stringent as we like it. In the future, if it looks like it needs to be improved, then they could improve it. I think it's a place to start."

What is critical, Lynch said, is the parameters regents will establish with the core curriculum.

It is yet to be determined what classes will be established for the high school curriculum. Denise Musser, director of communication for the regents, said a committee will be formed to set a curriculum in the fall.

If the regents wish to alter the parameters of the bill, like the minimum ACT score, it would have to clear legislation, Musser said.

"Last fall, 58 percent of freshmen indicated they had taken four years of English, three years of math, three years of science and three years of social studies," Lynch said.

But if courses such as economics, trigonometry and physics become part of the equation, Lynch said, percentages of acceptable students will plummet.

"If economics is included, for example, it drops to 35 percent," he said.

Alternatives: the road to regent institutions

Students who do not meet the requirements by the year 2001 will still have options open to continue their education.

Attending a community college is one alternative. A student needs only to complete 24 credit hours with a GPA of 2.0 or higher to qualify for admittance into a regent institution.

"A student could go take summer and fall classes and be here for the spring if they wanted," Lynch said.

Other options include attending a technical or vocational institution or applying for admission to a regent school when they are 21.

"The avenues are there," Lynch said.

Open access: a Kansas tradition closed out

Passage of the bill through the House and the Senate and into law has not gone unnoticed or without rebuttal.

Glasscock said admission standards means "not having dumb people, or what they perceive to be dumb people, come to our institutions."

ACT Class Profiles revealed that 33.5 percent of K-State's 1994 freshmen class scored below 20 on the ACT. But 91.8 percent maintained a 2.0 or higher grade point average.

Under the bill, a student must meet one of the requirements, meaning just 8.2 percent of K-State's freshmen would not have qualified for admission. Even if some of those students wouldn't qualify by graduating in the upper third of their class, they would fit in the 10-percent window.

The class profiles were self-reported, with 6.4 percent not reporting.

"Most of our students already meet these standards," Schell said. "There will be some K-State students who still won't be able to spell or write a cohesive paragraph."

But Glasscock attacked the philosophy of qualified admissions.

"My opposition rests on the simple notion that closing the door to access to education is counterproductive to any society," he said.

Tanner disagrees with the long-standing Kansas theory that everyone deserves an opportunity to sample college.

"That's arrogant," he said. "Arrogant populism. Things have changed."

What it will do, Glasscock said, is make students commit to the regents' curriculum at an early age.

"It forces kids at the age of 14 to decide on a college-bound curriculum," he said.

"In essence, a career decision."

Terry Taylor, counselor at Manhattan High School, said qualified admissions is similar to NCAA guidelines for athletes. If student athletes fail to meet the NCAA's set criteria, they are unable to gain admittance in NCAA schools.

The popular alternative for both is attending a community college first.

"Here's the NCAA and Regents telling you what to take," he said.

"We will have students who need to take shop and vocational classes but can't because of guidelines."

Taylor said about half of Manhattan's annual senior class attend K-State, and qualified admissions may turn away 3 or 4 percent.

The average ACT score at Manhattan High is 21.

"Some will not be able to go to school right here in Manhattan," he said.

"Some students aren't going to be real happy."

FACULTY OPINION

In an informal survey of 50 faculty, 46 supported the move to qualified admissions. Four were opposed.

A Derby facelift could include these ideas

QUICKread

Students should call the Housing and Dining Services at 532-6453 and give suggestions and opinions about the Derby Dining Center renovation.

Residents of the Derby Complex, it's time to celebrate.

The Derby Dining Center will be renovated sometime in the near future. In the light of this development, we would like to offer some suggestions of our own.

The service schedule just isn't accommodating to the average student's schedule. It's not always possible to make the three-hour window at traditional mealtimes. If students manage their time well enough to breeze in at the end of a meal, the food is probably cold (if there's anything left).

Why not open Derby from 7 a.m. to 7 p.m. every day, with reduced service between regular meals? At least leave the doors open so students could grab some cold cereal or a peanut butter and jelly sandwich.

The idea of a food court has also been kicked around. A food court would be great, whether it's in the actual cafeteria or downstairs in the lobby. Carts in the lobby would make grabbing something on the go much easier for many.

Sunday dinner service would also be great. How many times have you had to grab an apple or an orange at Sunday lunch to eat at dinner because of a lack of money?

Be friendly! Let students bring guests and pay for it with their own meal card, say, once a month. As long as it's not the holiday dinners, it wouldn't break Derby's bank, right? That's easier than scraping up the cash and maybe people would eat there more often.

These are our suggestions, but students need to get involved. Let the Housing and Dining Services know what you would like to see. After all, students are the ones who eat there.

Liberals less dangerous to public than conservatives

It's a good thing the Montana Freemen are white conservatives.

If they weren't, they would probably either be dead, in jail or would have been infiltrated and sabotaged by federal agents years ago.

In Montana, a kinder, gentler Federal Bureau of Investigation is in a staring match with them.

The FBI wants to arrest some of these Freemen on federal charges stemming from the phony checks they allegedly printed and for allegedly issuing death threats to federal judges. But the Freemen are armed to the teeth and an attempt to arrest these men will inevitably result in bloodshed on all sides.

So the FBI is sitting this one out. Public outrage about how it and other federal agencies mishandled similar attempts to arrest heavily armed right-wingers in the past has prompted the FBI to just wait for the Freemen come out on their own volition rather than by force.

The FBI and the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms tried to arrest white separatist Randy Weaver in Ruby Ridge, Idaho, in 1992 by brutal force. The result was some dead Weavers and dead federal agents.

FBI and ATF agents bit the dust at David Koresh's compound in Waco, Texas, too. In the end, Koresh and most of the right-wing religious zealots in his flock died. Some say because the federal government burned the compound down.

These events gave the extreme right all the evidence it needed to retaliate against a government it believes is run by the United Nations and Communists.

On the second anniversary of Koresh's death, Timothy McVeigh, a subscriber to the theory of a U.N. conspiracy to take over the United States, allegedly bombed the Oklahoma City federal office building in retaliation for the Waco fiasco.

Many Americans cheered his actions. These folks are hoping the Freemen prevail in Montana, as well.

These conservatives and populists are on the lookout for black helicopters in the sky said to be full of United Nations troops conducting reconnaissance missions for a coming invasion. People in the town of St. Marys are so paranoid about these helicopters the Wall Street Journal did a story about them.

They and conservatives like them believe the U.N. is building concentration camps for white Christian American folk to be exterminated in.

They also believe Amtrak is the train system that will be used to haul these white conservative Christians, who fancy themselves America's true patriots and guardians of the nation's heritage, to their deaths.

Frustrated, alienated and paranoid white men have been packing up and forming amateur militias to prepare for this apocalyptic day when the federal government is supposed to come and turn the United States into a United Nations-led Communist concentration camp.

Paranoia of a U.N. coup d'etat is rampant. The rhetoric is all over talk radio programs. Televangelists and radio ministers warn of impending global government, a sure sign of the eminent second coming Christ, they say. Even Pat Buchanan's thinly veiled references to globalism, the U.N. and loss of American sovereignty in his campaign speeches were aimed at these paranoid American conservatives.

That these people can seriously believe America has been taken over by the extreme left is ludicrous. They call President Clinton a liberal extremist constantly. But if he were as extreme to the left as, say, Oliver North is to the right, President Clinton would be an outspoken critic of capitalism, not a signatory of free trade agreements like GATT and NAFTA.

Not only that, but America's law enforcement have consistently been more harsh on the extreme left than the right. From FBI surveillance of such threats to national security as John Lennon and Martin Luther King Jr. to violent raids against the Black Panthers, from the fire bombing of a black nationalist compound in Philadelphia back in 1985 to the McCarthy Communist witch hunts of the 1950s, America has been much more violently and ideologically intolerant of the extreme left.

Yet it's the right-wing extremists around the world who are posing the greatest threats to public safety. The Oklahoma City bombing, the Amtrak bombing, the Unabomber, the World Trade Center bombing, the assassination of Yitzhak Rabin, various airline hijackings and saber rattling from Russia all have connections to brands of conservative nationalism, not liberalism, communism, socialism or even the United Nations.

So what is the right so paranoid about?

FUTURE K-STATERS NEED QUALIFIED ADMISSIONS

Editor,

Should open admissions versus qualified admissions be a primary concern with the future students of Kansas universities? Why is the state of Kansas finally joining in with the rest of the nation to pass the bill for qualified admissions? Is this really necessary?

The bill that recently passed in the Kansas House states a Kansas resident graduate of an accredited Kansas high school must achieve a minimum GPA of 2.0 on a 4.0 scale, achieve a composite ACT score of 21 points and above or be ranked in the top third of his or her high school class upon the completion of seven or eight semesters. These qualifications for any state graduate seem within reason in comparison to other schools and the qualifications for college athletes. For example, the requirements include a minimum GPA of 2.5 on a 4.0 scale and ACT score of 17 and above.

High school seniors should be able to meet these requirements. They should be prepared when it comes to graduation because the Kansas Board of Regents requires a pre-college curriculum schools must follow. We should be in favor of passing this bill and use the qualified admission policy as our focus point to set our goals high in the future.

This is possible. Let it begin first by motivating the class of 2001, the year qualified admissions would be in effect. We must make sure our teachers and counselors across the state stress the importance of a college education. Motivate these young adults to graduate from high school with one or all three of these qualifications. These children are our future. We must make sure the students have a reason to succeed and to be successful. Make them work hard for it. Make it a challenge. Show them the rewards and benefits of attending a fine learning institution like K-State.

Adlai E. Stevenson once said, "Let's talk sense to the American people, that there are no gains without pains."

We need to realize now, that we are taking baby steps. We can use the requirements for qualified admissions for our journey. Yes, it is going to be an adjustment, but we must stick it out, make these changes and move on.

Let's start planning for qualified admissions and firing up our future K-Staters to strive hard to meet these goals.

RELIGION SHOULDN'T MATTER FOR CANDIDATES

Editor,

I have noticed a frightening trend in this year's presidential politics and was concerned to see it continued in William Thomas Burdette's column titled "My grandpas would be better GOP candidates." Although I appreciated the overall message of this article, there is one phrase that disturbs me: "He has good Christian values." Burdette refers to this as one of the main reasons his grandfather would be qualified for the highest office in the land.

Lately, there has been a tendency to forget or overlook or intentionally undermine one of the most basic founding principles of this country: the separation of church and state. Religious persecution was one of the original reasons colonists came to this continent from Europe so long ago. If we begin to require that our candidates for public office represent a specific set of religious values, we are heading toward that same religious involvement in public government that our forebears crossed an ocean to escape.

Our generation has already been stereotyped as apathetic. Please, don't let us gain a reputation as persecutors of anyone who doesn't share our views as well.

This is a big university in a big country, and there is room for every person's ideas. Let's not choose our candidates on a religious basis. Instead, let us recognize the amazing diversity of religious beliefs and celebrate the success of our Constitution in creating a country safe for people of every denomination.

GOD DIDN'T CREATE MAN TO BE MINDLESS ROBOTS

Editor,

This letter is in response to Jason Hamilton's column questioning God's motives and his intelligence.

First of all, God did not create humans or angels to be little robots following whatever he commands them to do, just because they have no alternative. He created us to make decisions of our own. When Lucifer said in Isaiah 14:13, "I will exalt my throne above the stars of God" and tried to revolt against God with other angels, he did by his own free will. God knew they would try to attempt a rebellion, but because of his love he didn't zap their minds into thinking only good thoughts. He wanted the angels to be loyal to him because they wanted to, and not just because they had to.

The same principle applies to mankind. Hamilton thinks if God truly loved mankind, he would constantly rule with an iron fist, "changing evil people into good people with the snap of his holy fingers," without giving them the opportunity to disobey. How is that any different from a dictatorship? Most importantly, what would that prove about a person's loyalty to their creator? Nothing at all. We'd all be mindless robots.

Also, if there's no opportunity to do evil, there would be no reward for doing good. Would you give your car a reward because it got you to the store and back? No. You give rewards to people because they can think and have the chance to do bad but choose to do good. Hamilton says God should just give everyone a free pass to heaven and forget hell. However, heaven wouldn't even exist if there were no hell and no chance to reject God.

Even if people were given the chance to reject God as their ruler, would God let someone who's rejected him into heaven? Of course not. No one, not even Hamilton, would be willing to forgive and forget when someone they created says that they don't need him.

Thankfully, instead of Hamilton's world, our loving God has given us a choice. Everyone has sinned out of their own free will, because God has given us the opportunity to, and everyone is doomed to hell. However, instead of "making us good people" without our consent, he sent his son Jesus Christ to die in our place for our sins, and thereby giving us a choice of heaven or hell. We can either arrogantly spit in Jesus Christ's face like Hamilton, call God a "busy creator" and refuse to acknowledge his power, or we can humbly accept Christ's death as payment for our sins and go to heaven.

Some people will claim no loving God would throw anyone into hell. However, on the contrary, no loving God would force someone who hates him to go to heaven and be with him, but would allow that person to have their way and leave his presence, and go to hell, "where there is weeping and gnashing of teeth," and the eternal torment that comes with the absence of God (Matthew 22:13).

It's really ironic that someone who hates morality and anything that restricts his freedom to go against God's clear rules and absolute, but loving and choice allowing, power, would write a column telling how he would change the world to be a better God, by eliminating human decisions, and be even worse than the God he hates.

STUDENT PARKING AT UNION SHOULD BE OPEN

Editor,

I am writing concerning the student parking lot in front of the K-State Student Union.

I am a student at K-State, and I also work at the Union. Today, I tried to park in the student lot, and I was waived on by a Parking Services employee. I was forced to park in the metered parking lot, even though I have a permit.

When I arrived in the Union, I called Parking Services and was told that even though I pay $60 for a parking permit, I would have to pay to park in front of the Union. He also added I could park in another student parking lot and walk to work.

However, I do not feel I should have to walk from the parking lot at West Stadium when there are available student parking places in front of the Union.

To make a long story short, I feel the lot shouldn't have been blocked off for a conference at the Union.

Parking Services should have set aside metered parking spots for the conference, as it would do during a normal University schedule.

I also feel the students should come first when it comes to parking. I realize as a student parking permit holder, I am not guaranteed a spot. However, the only person who should be able to beat me out of a spot is another student.

In addition, I feel any tickets issued to students with parking permits should be waived because Parking Services is making the students pay extra for spots that should have been available in the first place. I think $60 a year for a parking permit is a substantial amount of money, and as a student, I should not have to pay to park in the metered spots when student parking is available.

In the future, I suggest Parking Services take into consideration those students who do not go on vacation during University shutdown. If the parking would not be blocked off during regular hours, it should not be blocked off during break either.

However, if Parking Services feels the need to block off the student permit parking lot, it should make arrangements so that the students with permits do not have to pay extra for parking that would otherwise be available.

Miss Kansas

by Nikki Prentice

Make-up, swimsuits, glittery evening gowns and a fit body isn't what the Miss Kansas pageant is about. More than just a beauty pageant for young women ages 17 to 24 years old, it is a way to earn scholarship money and gain self-confidence.

The Miss America organization is the largest scholarship foundation for young women in the world. It awarded $29 million in educational scholarships last year alone.

Seven K-State students and one K-State graduate will compete in this year's Miss Kansas pageant. Each woman will demonstrate her best in three on-stage categories hoping to win the sunflower title, then advance to the Miss America contest in September in Atlantic City, Ga.

To advance to the state pageant, contestants competed in a local preliminary pageant. The competitions required contestants to be 17 years old by Labor Day, graduated from high school, single and never been married.

After being crowned in the local pageants, the contestants will move on to the state competition, which will take place in June.

Alicia Shaneyfelt, senior in theater and costuming, will represent Manhattan at this year's Miss Kansas pageant.

Shaneyfelt, Miss Manhattan K-State '96, is the first Manhattan native to win the Little Apple title in 15 years.

When Shaneyfelt was crowned, she won a $1,000 scholarship and the People's Choice Award by audience vote.

The first time Shaneyfelt heard about the pageant was in high school.

She said the principal of Manhattan High School was the director of the 1993 pageant and encouraged her to compete. She won fourth runner-up. Since then, she has competed in nine other pageants.

Shaneyfelt said self-improvement is a benefit to competing in pageants.

"All the contestants are different shapes and sizes, and it's not like we are competing with each other but with ourselves," she said. "What matters is that you were able to better yourself from one competition to another."

Shaneyfelt said she's hoping to place in the top 10 at Miss Kansas.

"It would be a dream come true if I win Miss Kansas. I'm just aiming for the top 10, and then whatever comes after that happens," Shaneyfelt, 23, said.

Miss Metro Kansas City, Carrie Cox, said her family influenced her to participate in pageants.

"My aunt was Miss Kansas in '85 when I was in the sixth grade. She went to the Miss America pageant. From that point on, it was in my mind that I wanted to do the same thing," Cox, senior in electronic journalism, said.

Cox said her aunt has taught her a lot about pageants.

"In the past couple of years, my aunt was diagnosed with multiple sclerosis, and I've learned that just because you have the crown doesn't mean your life will be happy ever after," Cox said.

Cox won second runner-up in last year's Miss Kansas.

Kansas pageant. She said her second visit to the state level will be different.

"My first year I was still a rookie and only expected to do as well as I could," Cox said. "I think this year I feel a little more pressure because I think I know what it takes to become Miss Kansas, and that inside knowledge can either be enlightening or add pressure," she said.

Cox is a Golden Key National Honor Society member and involved in the Alpha Delta Pi sorority and the Kappa Phi United Methodist Women's Sorority. She is the former president of Mortar Board and participated in the K-State forensics program for two years.

Miss Kansas participant Caisha Williams, senior in theater, has been involved in pageants since her senior year in high school.

"When I was in high school, my vocal teacher was the executive director for the Hutchinson pageant," Williams, Miss Cheney Lake, said.

"Back then I was too young to enter, so I helped backstage. After a while, I was talked into entering, and the scholarship money was a good incentive," she said.

All contestants will compete in three stage categories. Talent will count for 40 percent of the total score.

Physical fitness in swimsuit will be 15 percent, evening wear is 15 percent, and private judge interviews conducted during pageant week will count for 30 percent of the total score.

Ten of the 23 women will advance to the final competition June 8 in Pratt.

Then the competition will narrow down to five finalists. Each finalist will respond to a question about the contestant's individual platform issue.

The platform issue is a cause or social issue the contestants will promote or stand behind during the year as Miss Kansas.

The title of Miss Kansas carries many responsibilities, said Kimmi, who has been involved in Miss Kansas for 20 years.

During Miss Kansas' year of service, she will represent Kansas at the Miss America pageant in Atlantic City in September.

She will be a spokeswoman for the Kansas Children Services League as well as Miss Kansas and Miss America organizations.

She will travel the state promoting her platform issue and the Kansas Children Services League. She is awarded a car and is paid for her appearances.

"The Miss America organization is a scholarship organization, not a beauty pageant, by mission," Kimmi said.

"Educational scholarships are the awards. Miss Kansas and all contestants will receive some type of scholarship," he said.

Tickets are available in a three-night package for $25 or individually.

The three-night package includes tickets to both the preliminary competition on Tuesday and Wednesday nights and the final pageant Saturday night.

Tickets only for Saturday are $15, and preliminary night tickets are about $7 per night.

Kimmi said Saturday's competition will also be televised live on the Kansas State Network. Showtime is 8 p.m.

Marilyn Hetzel, graduate student in science, said the scholarship money available was her incentive to compete in pageants.

Hetzel, Miss Greater Kansas City, entered Miss Manhattan K-State in 1995 for the scholarship opportunity and won the crown.

She advanced to Miss Kansas last summer and won the Rookie of the Year Award and Non-Finalist Interview Award.

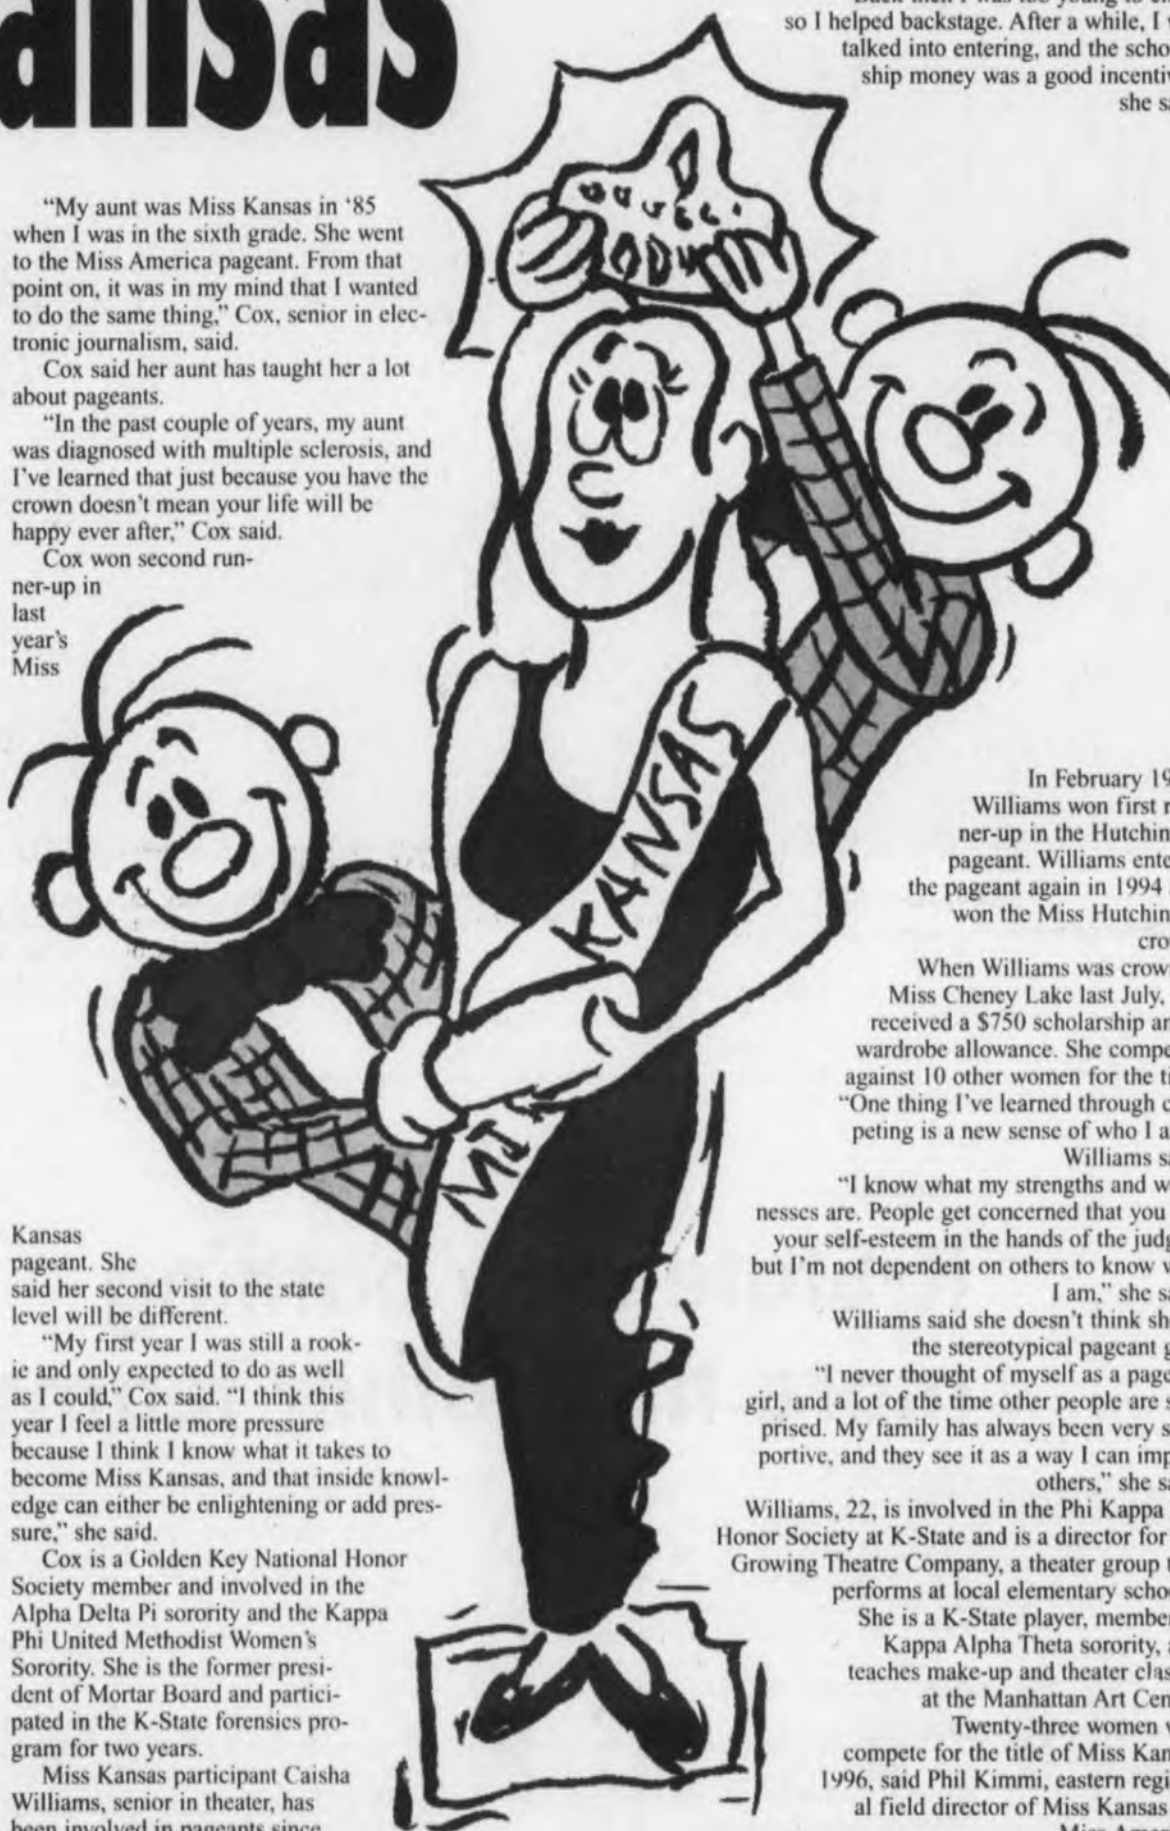

"This will be my last year to compete, and I've put a lot of hard work into it," Hetzel said.

"When you do this, a lot of people think you do it for self-gratification, but it lets you see who you are," she said.

Hetzel, 23, is part of the American Indian Science and Engineering Society and active in the College of Education. She is also a member of the Sigma Kappa Sorority.

Other K-State students and Miss Kansas contestants include Miss Topeka Deana Teske, junior in mass communication; Miss Hutchinson Cheryl Hadley, sophomore in music education; Miss Solomon Valley Terra St. Clair, junior in elementary education, and Lesley Moss, Miss Santa Fe Trail, a 1995 graduate in electronic journalism and public relations.

"I get personal satisfaction out of watching young women reach their full potential," Kimmi said. "I feel the program is a terrific self-improvement course through letting women improve physically and mentally. It's a win-win situation."

In February 1992, Williams won first runner-up in the Hutchinson pageant. Williams entered the pageant again in 1994 and won the Miss Hutchinson crown.

When Williams was crowned Miss Cheney Lake last July, she received a $750 scholarship and a wardrobe allowance. She competed against 10 other women for the title. "One thing I've learned through competing is a new sense of who I am," Williams said.

"I know what my strengths and weaknesses are. People get concerned that you put your self-esteem in the hands of the judges, but I'm not dependent on others to know who I am," she said.

Williams said she doesn't think she is the stereotypical pageant girl.

"I never thought of myself as a pageant girl, and a lot of the time other people are surprised. My family has always been very supportive, and they see it as a way I can impact others," she said.

Williams, 22, is involved in the Phi Kappa Phi Honor Society at K-State and is a director for the Growing Theatre Company, a theater group that performs at local elementary schools.

She is a K-State player, member of Kappa Alpha Theta sorority, and teaches make-up and theater classes at the Manhattan Art Center.

Twenty-three women will compete for the title of Miss Kansas 1996, said Phil Kimmi, eastern regional field director of Miss Kansas for Miss America.

It's Big 8 time for netters

Shane McCormick
contributing writer

The K-State women's tennis team will open its Big 8 competition this weekend at home.

The Cats will take on the Nebraska Cornhuskers at 2 p.m. Saturday. Then they will take to the courts against Iowa State at 11 a.m. Sunday.

During spring break, the tennis team continued its successful spring campaign. The Cats won three of four duals during the break.

Two of those wins came against nationally ranked opponents Utah and UNLV. But playing nationally ranked opponents has not been a new thing for the team this year. The Cats have already played six opponents this year who have been nationally ranked in the ITA rankings.

Coach Steve Bietau said playing quality opponents can definitely help a team going into conference play.

"I've always advocated that playing a strong schedule can help a team," he said. "Individuals can gain some great experience when playing top opponents."

During the break, senior Karina Kuregian continued her successful spring campaign. Included in her singles victories was a three-set win against the 31st-ranked Mirja Wallmark of Utah. Kuregian improved her spring singles record to 8-0. Kuregian has moved up 10 spots in the latest ITA rankings to No. 63.

Suffering her first defeats of the year was sophomore Yana Dorodnova. Both of Dorodnova's losses during the break came at the No. 1 spot.

"The losses she has taken have been against some great players," Bietau said. "But she has really stepped up in her doubles play. There has been no loss of confidence with her game."

Once again, health issues are a concern going into the Big 8 opener this weekend. Sophomore Lena Pilipchak has not practiced all week due to a viral problem.

Also unable to practice is freshman

DARREN WHITLEY/Collegian

Nikki Lagerstrom, a junior from Olathe, strikes back during a recent tennis match with Tulsa in Ahearn Field House. Lagerstrom defeated Tulsa's Dina Rodriguez 6-3, 7-5. Lagerstrom is 6-4 on the season in singles play.

Yasmine Osborn. Osborn is continuing to battle a stress fracture. Although sophomore Dinah Watson will play, she is still suffering tenderness in her shoulder.

Nebraska will not be an opponent the Cats haven't seen play this year. Just a month ago, the Cats saw the Cornhuskers play Tulsa University, although two key players on the Cornhuskers squad did not play during the contest.

Bietau said this Cornhuskers squad could be a dangerous team.

"They have tremendous depth on their team," Bietau said. "And they have a player that beat Dinah at the Big 8 Indoors just last fall."

Bietau said the team is concentrating on its main objective in the season.

"Our focus is to do what we can to step up a level from where we're at now," he said.

► BASEBALL

Cats' sluggers attempt to snare MU's Tigers

Chris May
contributing writer

While many students are leaving town for Easter weekend, the K-State baseball team will be entertaining the Missouri Tigers.

The Cats are 18-10 overall, 2-3 in the conference and are coming off a split series with the third-ranked Wichita State Shockers.

The three-game stint will start at 7 p.m. Friday at Frank Myers Field.

Missouri is tied with Oklahoma State for second place in the Big 8 with an impressive overall record of 22-8 and 7-3 in the conference.

The Cats are in fifth place in the Big 8. With three wins this weekend, K-State could gain momentum going into a long series with Big 8 opponents.

K-State has some good eggs in its basket as it has scheduled senior right-hander Matt Koeman to start the action off during the three-game series.

Koeman is no stranger to playing against Missouri.

Last year while playing the Tigers in Manhattan, Koeman struck out eight players and walked four in eight innings.

The Cats went on to win that game, 8-4.

Koeman leads the team in with a 3.81 earned run average. He is 4-2 on the season.

In the second game at 3 p.m. Saturday, the Cats will show off junior right-hander Eric Yanz. Yanz also is no stranger to the Tigers. He too beat the Tigers last year, in Columbia. Yanz pitched six innings as the Cats won that game, 12-6. Yanz is 4-3 for the year with a 4.37 ERA.

Look for sophomore left-hander Chris Traylor to finish up the duties on the mound Easter Sunday. Traylor is 2-0 on the season and has an ERA of 4.37.

Cat fans from Manhattan will see a familiar face as the hometown boy, right-hander Aaron Akin, who plays for Missouri, starts for the Tigers Saturday. Akin has a 4.93 ERA and is 4-1 on the season.

Other Tigers who are scheduled to see pitching time are left-hander Jay Bell, who posts an ERA of 4.89 and is 3-2 on the season, and right-hander Jeremy Callier, who is scheduled to start Sunday for the Tigers. Callier is 6-1 on the year and has a 5.28 ERA.

The Cats are looking to repeat their performance in last year's series in Manhattan, when they swept the Tigers in the two-game stint.

If the Cats can pull off the three wins, they will have beaten the Tigers seven out of the last eight games.

A win this weekend would also send Cat baseball coach Mike Clark to his 600th career coaching win. Clark, in his 10th season with the Cats, already broke 250 career coaching wins at K-State earlier this season with a win against Xavier.

If the Cats can win one of the three games this weekend, Clark's career coaching at college, junior college and high school level would reach the 600 level mark.

Clark was unavailable for comment.

The baseball team will offer a little something extra for the fans this Sunday besides a good game.

The first 300 fans will receive a plastic Easter egg with a ticket inside. During each inning, a ticket will be called out, and prizes will be awarded.

Fans will want to stay for the whole game because in the eighth inning the grand prize of $50 in cash will be given out.

The Cats will be back in action April 9 at Frank Myers Field as they take on the Nebraska Cornhuskers.

► CREW

K-State club battling more than other teams

John Berggren
staff writer

Weather permitting, the K-State crew team will see its first action of the season at the Sunflower State Championships at Tuttle Creek Reservoir.

Other teams competing in the event will be Kansas, Wichita State and Washburn.

Crew coach Al Koch and crew team captain Wally Margheim said Wichita State will be the team to beat.

"Wichita State has been one of the best overall crews in Kansas," Koch said. "K-State and Kansas should be neck-and-neck, and Washburn is a little bit down."

"Wichita is always a pretty good team," Margheim said. "They beat us in a fairly close race in Texas."

"We're a little bit down this year. We don't have as many people out as we usually do."

As a consequence, K-State will only be competing in the four-person events and not in the eight-person events in Saturday's competition.

Margheim said he wasn't sure why his team numbers were down.

"For some reason this semester, our numbers are down, and I don't specifically know why," Margheim said.

"Our novice numbers are up, and we've got a real good chance of our novice teams winning some events this weekend and all year long."

"I'm real excited for next semester when our novice rowers move up to varsity."

The crew teams are coming off a week-long training event in Waco, Texas, during spring break. Koch said the trip was beneficial to his team.

"There were pluses and minuses to the trip,"

Koch said.

"We didn't have the warm weather that we're used to having when we're down there," he said.

"The weather was in the 40s and 50s the whole time, and we usually have 60 and 70 degree weather when we're there."

"We were still able to get out on the water, though, and the kids were able to get to know each other," Koch said.

"I think we're rowing pretty well, but we haven't seen as much time on the water as we usually do."

"We've had about two weeks less practice time than we usually have at this time in the season. The cold and windy weather has hurt us some this year."

We're a little bit down this year. We don't have as many people out as we usually do. For some reason this semester, our numbers are down, and I don't specifically know why.

LAWRENCE — As Kansas begins spring practice, a frustrated Ronnie Ward almost feels as though he's getting out of jail.

A shoulder injury he suffered in a pickup basketball game in July 1995 forced the star linebacker to be a mere spectator in the Jayhawks' spectacular 10-2 campaign last year.

Now he's back and looking forward to spring practice to "get myself into football shape."

With Ward and several other defensive stars coming off injury-induced redshirt seasons, the Jayhawks would seem to be in position to improve over last year's 10-win season.

"I think I'm probably more excited now than I've ever been going into spring practice," said the 6'0", 235-pound Ward, who led the 1994 Jayhawks with 98 tackles.

Sitting out a season, he said, "was a lot tougher than I thought it would be. I wanted to be out there whether we were successful or not. It was hard to swallow, sitting out an entire season."

"In case you forgot, Ronnie Ward's an awful good player," Coach Glen Mason said on Wednesday, the day before he opened spring practice.

"Some guys make plays, some don't. He makes a lot of plays. He's bigger, stronger and two years older than the last time he played. We're looking for great things for Ronnie."

Mason admits the attitude and atmosphere is drastically different from what he knew last spring, when the Jayhawks were expected to be nothing more than also-rans in the Big 8 last season.

"Last year in the beginning of spring I was in the position of defending our program and defending myself," he said.

"When you look back to last year, we had so many question marks, so many holes to fill, so many young players, I can see where you'd say we didn't have much of a chance."

They might not win as many games as last year, but the 1996 Jayhawks could be even better than the bunch that beat everybody on their schedule except Nebraska and Kansas State and then polished off the year with a 51-30 whipping of UCLA in the Aloha Bowl.

They return seven starters on offense and seven on defense.

And that doesn't count the likes of Ward and defensive back Tony Blevins, who also sat out last season with an injury.

"On paper, this team is better than last year talent-wise," Mason said. "But what we do in the next couple of weeks will have a definite impact on how we do in the 1996 season."

The Jayhawks will have a new starting quarterback in Ben Rutz, who knows a thing or two about sitting out seasons himself.

An Oklahoma native who originally enrolled at Nebraska and then transferred, Rutz saw action in six games last year as Mark Williams' backup.

"He has a great rapport with players," tight end Jim Moore said.

"We respect Ben for what he's been through. We're looking for him to take over the offense, take control. He's proved he can do that."

In Moore, Rutz will have one of the better tight ends in the country. He might even be the first all-Big 12 tight end.

"I can't think of anybody who will have a better tight end in the Big 12 than Jimmy Moore," Mason said.

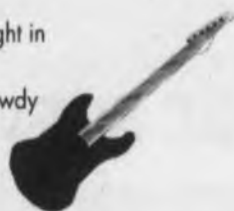

"He's a dominant blocker. No one has improved his blocking ability since he's been at Kansas more than Jimmy. He's a real leader. We're confident he'll have an outstanding year."

The Jayhawks are also looking for big things from senior running back June Henley, who was plagued by injury the past two years after setting the school rushing record as a freshman.

INTERVIEW

Clay returns to stand-up comedy, 'Diceman' attitude

J. Scot Bucholz
staff writer

After having his television show canceled and his career in limbo, Andrew "Dice" Clay is coming back to comedy and what he knows.

May 11, in an HBO special, Clay will be doing his first concert, "Assume the position."

"After this night, I will become the biggest comic in this country, in this genre," Clay said.

Clay said he got soft and lazy during his time away from stand-up comedy.

"The producers made me change," he said. "Never again."

During Clay's time away from the stand-up stage, he did something new for his career by doing a situation comedy. Clay had a starring role as Burt Clayton in the short-lived CBS series "Bless This House."

"The show was a lot of fun and hard work — another stop along an even more varied career than I first imagined. It was a pleasure to perform with an actress of Cathy Moriarty's caliber and professionalism," he said.

Clay said he felt the pressure to sublimate the Diceman attitude that remains a part of Clay's persona.

"My audience loves the Diceman. He's out to make people laugh their guts out and stir up the complacent. In this day and age of political correctness, the Diceman can open his mouth and cause the uptight to get riled up enough to protest," he said. "The idea here is to have a great time, poke fun at circumstances and at ourselves."

Though Clay said he thoroughly enjoyed working on the show and the experience of doing a series, he reflects that his TV character should have developed much more of an edge. Clay said he would do another TV series.

"I suppose so, but it would have to be right," he said. During the last 18 months, Clay has been writing all new material for his stand-up routine.

"It is my greatest work to date," he said.

Clay said in the beginning of his career, he did not know what he was doing.

"And now there is nobody who can touch me as a comic," he said.

Anybody can put an act or a little skit together, and they even could become famous, Clay said.

"But there are not better than me," he said.

Clay said the media painted him a racist and that might have hurt him in his career.

"I am no racist," he said. "The media is racist."

Clay said he just takes reality and shows it to you comically.

"I am making jokes," he said. "To the media, I say now, fuck them. I tell the jokes."

Clay says he just wants to get out there and give the public what it wants.

"I am here to make people laugh, and that is the way it is going to be," he said.

Clay said nobody ever caused the uproar that he did. "I excite the fans like at a rock concert," he said.

This is my destiny, to be the biggest comic, Clay said. "My ego is on stage," he said. "That is where I tell the jokes."

Clay said he is taking a different approach in promoting his comeback by talking to fans directly.

"This way I get to see them up close, and I already know what they want," he said.

It has been eight years since his last HBO special. "What I will do now will surpass it," he said. "There was only one Babe Ruth, one Elvis, and there will be only one Diceman."

DERBY FOOD CENTER

Dining hall to improve

Housing, dining experiment with students' eating preferences

Jessica White
staff reporter

Derby Dining Center might be getting a new image, and student input will have a lot to do with the finished product.

The Housing and Dining Department is still in the research phase of a remodeling project for Derby.

"First we've got to know what our students want," said John Pence, associate director of housing and dining.

The Department of Housing and Dining has been experimenting with different ideas to see what the students like. One of the more popular ideas has been the "grab-n-go" concept.

"They've had a breakfast cart out here where you can pick stuff up and go, and they had it for a week at lunch," said Eric Keen, junior in mechanical engineering and president of the Kansas State Association of Residence Halls.

The breakfast and lunch carts were placed downstairs in Derby where students could just stop by and take something with them to class or up to their rooms. Cold items like bagels and sandwiches were offered on both carts.

"They've both been really popular, but I'd say the lunch thing went over really well," Keen said. "A lot of people went and ate it outside on nice days."

Pence said they might also experiment with having food to go available upstairs, to see if students would go upstairs to get food.

Hot foods to go are also an option and might be put in Styrofoam boxes. Pence said experiments with hot foods to go could be done.

"The idea is to go toward a food court like you'd have at the mall," Keen said. "You have one area that specializes in hamburgers, one in pizza, a Mexican, a deli, an Italian and a classic kind of the mom-and-dad meal."

The size of Derby might be a problem in creating a food-court atmosphere.

"There is no place that we know of that has a food-court type concept that serves 1,800 students that this building does," Pence said.

Pence said they need to get some kind of a concept of the amount of business they would have for each kind of food, so they would know which things to put together.

Mark Edwards, unit dietitian at Derby, said he hopes to use architects from campus to help with the design.

He said the original idea to redo Derby came from a resident who was an architecture student, and he hopes he continues to get student input after the design stage has started.

"One of the things that we run into is that when we ask students what they'd like to see, they begin to name off the things that we're doing right now," Edwards said. "The majority of our students need to see ideas on paper before they really begin to contemplate them."

Construction is scheduled to start summer 1997, with some concepts available by fall or winter 1997.

Pence said the renovation should cost about $1.8 million. This money will come from a fund built into the residence hall fee two years ago.

Truman Scholar serves others

Sara Edwards
staff writer

Shanté Moore has done volunteer work on three continents, works two jobs, speaks several languages and is involved in many campus activities. One of the main reasons he keeps going at a non-stop pace is his strong commitment to helping people.

Moore, a senior in political science and Latin American studies, is the 19th Truman Scholar from K-State. The scholarship winners receive $30,000 for four years of study in a public service field.

"It hasn't hit me yet, in all honesty. I'm so busy. I'm happy, but it's not that elation. I haven't thought about what I've accomplished. I just keep going," he said.

Moore said he hopes to use the scholarship to attend a big-name university like Harvard or Princeton. He eventually wants to work in the foreign service or be an ambassador.

"I have an interest in helping people out," he said.

Moore has participated in the K-State international community service program in Paraguay. He has also traveled to India to work.

Besides his service abroad, he also spends many hours working at K-State and in his hometown of Junction City.

A few of the activities he is involved with are Rotaract Club, the Black Student Union and Big Brothers/Big Sisters. He works with youth at a juvenile detention center in Junction City. Moore said the idea of helping people came from his family background.

"It's something I feel like I got to do," he said.

He said his service work in Paraguay helped him practice diplomacy and gave him the desire to do more service work.

"I wanted to travel, and I got hooked. I enjoy it now," he said.

He said working in an underdeveloped country made him look at things in a different way.

He spoke of how the parents in Paraguay worked hard just so they could afford uniforms and their children's education.

"It matures you. In the U.S., things come easy for us that other countries struggle for. It's a tribute to our country," he said.

Moore said visiting other countries with different cultures was a perfect opportunity to use his diplomatic skills.

"It's a tight community. You have to fit yourself in. If the community doesn't accept you, the project doesn't work. You have to be a good diplomat," he said.

He made an effort during the service trips to get to know the people. He said sitting around and talking with the people taught him about the country.

"A lot of people in the U.S. can't relate to their problems. I was trying to relate through their eyes," he said.

He immersed himself in culture by walking or taking the bus to neighboring towns.

"Live like they live, experience the culture, be diplomatic and eat the food—even if you have to fake that you like it," he said.

One topic the duo sees as an important issue is student drunken driving.

"There is a big problem with drunk driving on campus," Cowan said. "We wish the campus would do something to help with this. It just brings the campus bad publicity."

After speaking with other University officials throughout the Midwest, Cowan suggests establishing a University-sanctioned taxi service to operate as designated drivers.

"We want to open up lines of communication with other schools on issues that we are facing here on campus — to see how they are doing it," Cowan said. "We want to see how other schools are handling the same issues we face."

► UNABOMBER INVESTIGATION

Search reveals pipe bomb, paper trail

■ Unabomber suspect held in Helena, Mont., jail without bail

Associated Press

HELENA, Mont. — Federal investigators tracking Unabomber suspect Theodore Kaczynski's movements are trying to learn how the former math professor, who had no visible means of support, could get to other states where the Unabomber's bombs were mailed or left.

They reportedly are checking whether he rode buses to those states; two bus-line employees in Montana told the Associated Press Kaczynski was a passenger numerous times.

Kaczynski, 53, was taken into custody at his cabin near Lincoln, Mont., Wednesday and is being held without bail in a Helena jail. He has been charged in federal court with possession of bomb-making materials.

The charge is intended to keep Kaczynski in custody while investigators build a case against him for the Unabomber attacks that killed three people and injured 23 in nine states during the past 18 years.

Meanwhile, the painstaking search of Kaczynski's 10-foot-by-12-foot cabin continued Sunday. FBI spokesman George Grotz said investigators were combing the cabin and the surrounding forest.

The cabin search already has turned up a partially completed pipe bomb, bomb-making chemicals and components and notes on making bombs.

One law enforcement official said a typewriter found in the cabin appears to be the one the Unabomber used to type his 35,000-word manifesto and letters. Another said investigators found and defused a live bomb in the cabin Friday that they believe was intended for someone in particular.

U.S. attorneys from California, New Jersey, Montana and Utah are scheduled to meet today in Washington, D.C., to discuss where to have the Unabomber trial.

The Sacramento Bee has reported that officials are leaning toward Sacramento as the site because two of the killings were there.

Former attorney general Dick Thornburgh said it is unlikely the case would be tried in state court, as California Gov. Pete Wilson has requested.

"The track record of criminal cases in the federal court is somewhat better than it is in most state courts, and I think the department and the attorney general will be much more comfortable having it tried in federal court," Thornburgh said Sunday on ABC's "This Week With David Brinkley."

Thornburgh said today's meeting also will focus on whether Kaczynski should be charged with most or all of the Unabomber's crimes.

Newsweek magazine reported Sunday that Kaczynski approached a grocer in Lincoln in the summer of 1994 to ask about getting a job.

"He said he was running out of funds," grocer Becky Garland told the magazine. "He said, 'I don't know how to go out and get a job. It's been so long since I've done something like that.'"

He gave her a handwritten letter that included his difficulties growing up as "a genius in a kid's body and sticking out like a sore thumb in his surroundings as a child," Garland said.

The Chicago Tribune reported Sunday that federal agents in mid-March searched a shed at the Kaczynski family home in the Chicago suburb of Lombard, Ill., and found matches, traces of gunpowder and half-empty containers of compounds used in making explosive devices.

The newspaper, citing unnamed sources, said agents also determined that Kaczynski was in the Chicago area when the first four Unabomber devices were planted or mailed from there in the late 1970s and early 1980s.

The first bombs contained either wooden match heads or gun powder. One of the devices contained both, the Tribune reported.

► FARM LEGISLATION

Bill gives new funding options

 Clinton: expected to sign
 Farm Bill
 this week

After waiting two months, with crops ready to be planned and planted, farmers are getting closer to seeing how their lives could change under a new Farm Bill.

President Clinton is expected to sign a new Farm Bill sometime this week — just in time for spring planting.

Sixty years after the original Farm Bill was signed by Franklin Delano Roosevelt, Congress is pondering the idea of plowing under the central components of the 1933 Farm Bill, which are government price supports and payments to farmers taking land out of production.

The bill, which kept intact most of Rep. Pat Roberts' "Freedom to Farm" legislation introduced during summer 1995, replaces the Depression-era subsidy programs with a seven-year system of direct, declining payments designed to wean producers off the government. Roberts, R-Kan., is chair of the House Agriculture Committee.

"We have a bold, innovative rewrite of a 60-year-old program that provides greater flexibility for farmers and takes the dead hand of government out of individual decision-making on the farm," Roberts said.

Government subsidies will no longer be linked to crop prices, farmers will actually get more money during the next two years than they would have under the law it replaces.

During the next seven years of this bill, the federal government is scheduled to save about $2.2 billion from anticipated spending under the current law.

After President Clinton signs the Farm Bill into law, farmers will have 45 days to decide whether to sign contracts for the new seven-year government payments, Roberts said.

"Basically, the decision is whether or not farmers want to receive a farm program payment," he said.

For farmers, the bill means they can plant to the intricacies and Candidates discuss campaigns, platforms

Presidential candidates gave students an up close and personal look at their goals and feelings about their campaigns.

At a presidential forum Sunday night at Derby Dining Center, students expected to see what the candidates for president and vice president were really like. About 30 people attended the forum.

"I want to hear them. I've read a lot, but I want to hear what they have to say — the kind of image they present in real life," Paul English, junior in history, said.

What they had the opportunity to see was candidates Trent LeDoux and Brent Wiedeman, Chris Hansen and Aaron Otto, and Hiram H. Horsefeathers (Joshua Baze) address issues from their goals if they were elected to campus security.

LeDoux and Wiedeman emphasized keeping student fees down and increasing student involvement in how money is spent.

"I'm getting a little tired of seeing student fees going up as well as

Students to vote this week

 Misty Mayden

Candidates for Student Senate, college councils, Union Governing Board, Fine Arts Council and the Board of Student Publications will be voted for in this year's student government election Tuesday and Wednesday.

Students can place their votes in their respective colleges on Tuesday, in Kramer and Derby complexes on Tuesday night and on the ground floor in the K-State Student Union Wednesday.

"The voting in the colleges and in Derby and Kramer is different from what we've done in past years," Chad Schneider, Election Committee chairman, said.

The voting in the Union will be exactly the same, except it will be on the ground floor.

Students will be voting by scantron, similar in form to various exams given in classes.

"Basically, they will be given a scantron sheet," Sean Asbury, member of the Election Committee, said. "Then they will just fill in the number of circles allowed for each position."

Students will not be allowed to bring any type of voting guide with them into the polling areas, Schneider said.

"We will be regulating the polling areas so that no campaign materials will be brought around the polling area. We might be able to put a voter's guide near the area for the students, but personal guides will not be allowed," Schneider said.

► INTERNATIONAL NITE

Evening showcases cultural heritages

 Rhonda A. Lee

Music, dancing and food from across the globe were represented Friday at International Nite.

"Colorful Reflections: A Taste of the World" was selected as this year's theme because it best reflected the many kinds of people of the Manhattan community. About 200 people, an increase from last year, were in attendance for the final event of International Week, which helped raise money for the International Student Center expansion project.

"We all reflect many different colors and cultures that help make K-State and the community more diverse," said Nyambe Harleston, treasurer of the International Coordinating Council and the second master of ceremonies for the night's program.

Manuri Nakkawita, officer for the International Coordinating Council and one of the masters of ceremonies of the program, said this year's International Nite was moved from Manhattan Middle School to the K-State Student Union in hopes of increasing campus participation.

Dinner was served by student volunteers in a buffet-style setting, followed by the entertainment program of nine dancing and musical acts, provided by many campus international student organizations and volunteers from the Manhattan community.

Nakkawita said one of her main objectives for everyone that evening was to eat, drink and be merry, but she was also hoping to give something back to the Manhattan and K-State community while raising money for the expansion of the International Student Center.

► CLINTON CONSOLES FAMILIES OF BOSNIAN PLANE CRASH VICTIMS

DOVER AIR FORCE BASE, Del. (AP) — As 33 flag-draped caskets were solemnly brought home on Saturday, a sorrowful President Clinton said the lives of Commerce Secretary Ron Brown and 32 other victims of a plane crash reflected the best of America. "They are a stern rebuke to the cynicism that is all too familiar today."

The president, his voice cracking with emotion on a raw, cloudy day, declared "what they did while the sun was out will last with us for ever."

The caskets were delivered to grieving, still-shocked families as the Air Force Band played hymns and "My Country 'Tis of Thee."

Clinton, along with his wife and Vice President Al Gore, consoled each family in private. The emotion of the moment clearly showed in the president's face.

"Today we come to a place that has seen too many sad homecomings, because this is where we in America bring home our own, those who have given their lives in the service of their country," Clinton told the crowd.

His voice often near breaking, the president talked about his visits with the families.

"Their loved ones were proud of what they were doing," he said. "They believed in what they were doing. They believed in their country, and they believed they could make a difference."

► 7 SUSPECTED ILLEGAL IMMIGRANTS DIE; 18 INJURED IN TRUCK CRASH

TEMECULA, Calif. (AP) — A stolen truck crammed with suspected illegal immigrants overturned on a rural road while being followed by Border Patrol agents Saturday, killing seven men and injuring 18 others.

The crash happened about 5:30 a.m. when the truck's driver lost control of the truck on a curvy, hilly road and it overturned in a gully, crushing its cab.

"When we pulled up, we had people all over the bank," said Riverside County fire Capt. Tom Drayer.

"We had the truck upside down.

We had people sticking out of all different avenues."

One survivor was flown to a hospital with serious head injuries; the extent of the others' injuries was not immediately known. Firefighters found one man with a leg injury in a nearby avocado orchard.

The identities of the dead and injured were not immediately known, although all were men between the ages of 20 and 30, Drayer said.

The driver sped up after being followed by the agents for about 12 miles. The agents were not chasing the truck and did not flash lights or sound a siren, California Highway Patrol Officer Ralph Martinez said.

It was not immediately clear if the driver was among those killed or whether he knew the Border Patrol agents were behind him.

The accident happened less than a week after a truck filled with illegal immigrants was chased from the Temecula area over 80 miles to South El Monte in Los Angeles County.

The chase ended with the videotaped beating of two illegal immigrants by Riverside County sheriff's officers.

► YELTSIN DOMINATES POLLS

MOSCOW (AP) — For an unpopular leader dogged by heart problems and a tippler's image, Boris Yeltsin is truly on a roll.

He dominated the presidential campaign over the past week and closed in on Communist front-runner Gennady Zyuganov in the polls.

If the trend continues, Russia's second-ever presidential election will be Yeltsin's to win or lose.

But the 65-year-old Yeltsin still has imposing challenges in the 10 weeks before the election June 16. Top on the list: staying healthy through a grueling campaign and avoiding a blowup of the war in Chechnya.

"Other than his health, which is a limiting factor for him, his chances now are very good," Nikolai Petrov, a Moscow-based political analyst for the Carnegie Endowment for Peace, said Friday.

"But right now he's running a 10,000-meter race as a 100-meter sprint. It won't be so easy to keep up the fast pace."

Yeltsin appeared ebullient in his self-proclaimed role as Russia's only hope of preventing the Communists from retaking power.

► TRADE CUTOFF HURTS IRAQIS

UNITED NATIONS (AP) — With a strangling U.N. embargo making life increasingly miserable for Iraqi civilians, diplomats are questioning whether they will ever again impose such a complete cutoff in trade.

The United Nations banned virtually all trade with Iraq 5-1/2 years ago as punishment for its invasion of Kuwait.

Yet Saddam retains a firm hold on power, and U.N. weapons inspectors report a lack of full cooperation from the Baghdad regime.

Meanwhile, his people are so desperate they are selling their belongings in the streets to raise money to buy food.

To soften the misery, the United Nations has offered for years to allow Iraq to sell some oil under U.N. supervision to raise money for imports of food, medicine and other humanitarian supplies. But Saddam refused, saying that would be an affront to Iraq's sovereignty.

The United Nations put forward a new proposal last April to permit Iraq to sell $1 billion of oil every 90 days, and a third round of negotiations on the offer opens today.

Good Friday

Service honors Easter holiday with worship

Laurel Howell
staff writer

All Faiths Chapel was filled with feelings of friendship, enthusiasm and community Friday evening as InterVarsity Christian Fellowship welcomed the campus to its celebration of Good Friday.

Good Friday is a Christian holiday remembering the death of Jesus Christ. It precedes Easter Sunday, the celebration of the resurrection of Christ.

The evening featured a dramatic presentation, music and speaker Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life.

Franklin said racial unity is one of the messages of Easter.

God sent Christ to reunite those he had separated by language and distance in the time of Babel, Franklin said.

The Bible story of Babel is about God separating his people by language and distance so they would learn they needed him as much as each other.

He said the message of Easter is still significant today, because it is about God reuniting those who had been driven apart, much like people now separated by race.

"He came to unite men and women of all backgrounds," Franklin said. "He came to redeem us and make us one."

Song leaders Katie DeWeese, Brain Welch and Kat Jordan led the congregation through several Easter songs, including "You Are Mighty," "Give Praise to Jesus," "We Believe," "Under the Blood of the Lamb" and "There is a Redeemer."

Tim Newman and Jennifer Kummer, InterVarsity Christian Fellowship members, presented a story about a bridge operator who brought his son to work with him one day.

When the bridge operator raised the bridge to allow ships to pass, the son was caught in the gap in the bridge.

The man could not free his son and was forced to choose between saving his son and saving the people in a train that would cross the bridge. He chose to sacrifice his son to save the train from falling into the river.

The tale is a metaphor for the story of Easter and when God chose to give up his son to save humankind from sin.

► KSU STUDENT FELLOWSHIP

Events to celebrate life of Jesus Christ

Jill Story
staff reporter

KSU Student Fellowship is challenging the campus to take a look at Jesus Christ this week.

"The purpose of Jesus Week is to spread the name of Jesus Christ on campus, to share who Christ was and his purpose for coming to earth, which is to save us," said Rebecca Schulz, junior in mass communications and committee member for the event.

The week's activities begin today with an all-campus prayer day from 8:30 a.m. to 3 p.m. in Union 212. Anyone is invited to drop by, Schulz said.

Tuesday, there will be a drama presentation from noon to 1 p.m. in the Union Courtyard and an open discussion about discipleship at 2:30 p.m. in Union 213.

Christopher Gornold-Smith, a television scriptwriter, will speak from noon to 1 p.m. Wednesday in the Union Courtyard and at 7 p.m. at All Faiths Chapel. His topic is "Why I Am Not an Atheist."

"I would encourage everyone to come and see him. This guy is phenomenal. He's a really good communicator," Scott McPeck, staff adviser for KSU Student Fellowship, said.

Activities will continue with a drama from 11 a.m. to 1 p.m. Thursday in the free-speech zone and an open discussion on Bible studies at 2:30 p.m. in the Union Big 8 Room.

An all-campus prayer and praise meeting will be at 7 Thursday night in All Faiths.

"Each event will be special, but in particular I would encourage all who can to attend the all-campus prayer and praise meeting," Kristi Salmans, sophomore in public relations, said.

There will also be a special outreach service at 7 p.m. Friday in All Faiths.

"We won't force anything on anyone. We just want to present what we know to be true in our hearts," Schulz said.

An information table will be set up in the free-speech zone today through Friday, and there will be a 24-hour phone room set up for people with questions concerning Christ or issues of faith, Schulz said.

This is the second annual Jesus Week. KSU Student Fellowship receives help from other Christian groups on campus, including InterVarsity Christian Fellowship, Campus Crusade, Christian Challenge, Chi Alpha and Icthus.

"I am more than excited about Jesus Week. I am on fire about it. I just hope people realize that we just don't do this for a week. This is the way we have chosen to live our lives," Salmans said.

► CENSORSHIP

ACLU president to speak

Lynn Wuger

The president of the American Civil Liberties Union will speak about pornography Tuesday night in the K-State Student Union.

ACLU President Nadine Strossen will present "Pornography and Free Speech" at 7 p.m. in Forum Hall. Her lecture, sponsored by Union Program Council Issues and Ideas Committee, will focus on the right to have pornography and how it affects women.

"We thought censorship would be an excellent topic for a lecture," Matt Jones, chairman of UPC Issues and Ideas Committee, said.

"Every day there are people who try to challenge free speech, and censorship is a heated debate with the recent passing of the Communications Decency Act. Nadine Strossen is an expert in this area."

As a professor of constitutional law at New York Law School, Strossen is concerned with the constitutionality of the decency act, including the provisions that limit pornography on the Internet.

"She does not feel pornography is abusive to people, and she also does not think it is degrading to women," Jones said.

"She is going to be taking the same

Dear Friends:

Two students who have developed a thorough understanding of Kansas State University--both inside and outside of student government, who harbor a deep purple pride, who we enthusiastically support for Student Body President and Vice President. Who are we talking about? Chris Hansen and Aaron Otto. We want to share with you our reasons for supporting the Hansen/Otto ticket.

Chris Hansen, a junior in the College of Engineering, brings a fresh, non-Student Senate perspective. His comprehension of the new student recruitment challenges facing our university and his working relationship with the K-State Alumni Association are both unique. We have witnessed his visionary take-the-time-to-listen to you style of leadership first hand.

Aaron Otto, a junior in the College of Arts and Sciences, perhaps has the most thorough understanding of Student Senate and brings a complete understanding of the legislative processes in the City of Manhattan and the State of Kansas.

Chris and Aaron bring the best package for K-State's next Student Body Administration. They are committed to making teacher evaluations public, working to keep tuition dollars at K-State. More importantly, they are well qualified student leader with the ability to represent the K-State student and make difficult decisions.

We want leaders who will represent the K-Sate student on all issues. Chris Hansen and Aaron Otto will do just that.

Join us in supporting the best Student Body President/Vice President Ticket: HANSEN/OTTO.

SGA Elections '96 COLLEGIANendorsements

These endorsements reflect the majority opinion of the Collegian Editorial Board. Candidates were given the opportunity to give interviews with the Editorial Board, explaining their platforms and answering questions about their views. Those candidates who did not appear for the interviews were not considered in the endorsement process. The endorsements are printed in alphabetical order, and the names of the Editorial Board members are printed in the flag. Please remember to vote in student elections Tuesday and Wednesday. Look in today's election guide special section for times and voting places and procedures.

Student Body President and Vice President

Two members of the Board of Student Publications are running for the offices of student body president and vice president. Aaron Otto is the chair of the board, and Trent LeDoux is a member. Our endorsement does not reflect the fact these two candidates serve on the board.

Chris Hansen/Aaron Otto.

Hansen

Otto

WE ENDORSE CHRIS HANSEN AND AARON OTTO.

While all the candidates we spoke with impressed us, the Hansen/Otto ticket was by far the strongest. During the interview, they showed they can work together as a team and have a joint vision for K-State. Hansen has shown a willingness to compromise and is generally interested in discovering the wants of students. The ticket has made a great effort to contact student groups during the campaign and said they wanted to continue that practice.

Their platform is impressive, with solid ideas about publishing teacher evaluations, keeping fees at a reasonable level (yet funding what needs to be funded) and campus issues such as safety, bicycles and working with the city and state.

The most original idea they have is publishing teacher evaluations on the World Wide Web. It is an inexpensive way to get the information out. They also stressed the need to work with the faculty and getting faculty input about the evaluations.

We feel the worst position candidates can take is promising no new fees, regardless of circumstances. Hansen/Otto have promised to provide quality services at K-State by balancing the need for fees and service quality.

The other candidates

TRENT LEDOUX/BRENT WIEDEMAN

This ticket presents a qualified pair of candidates, but we feel they did not present enough research about their platform. Some of their ideas were vague, and when questioned, LeDoux and Wiedeman did not have many specifics about how things would be paid for and how policies would be implemented. This is in sharp contrast to Hansen/Otto. We also feel they would not work well as a team, as LeDoux's forceful personality dominated the entire discussion.

JOSHUA BAZE/COLIN RAFFERTY (APPEARING ON THE BALLOT AS HIRIAM H. HORSEFEATHERS/EZEKIEL McCracken)

We really admire these two individuals. It is not an easy task on this campus to run when you have no name recognition or experience in Senate at K-State. So they decided to make their names stick out in voters' minds. We decided not to endorse them, but not because of their costumes. We understand the need for individualism.

However, while the two are sincere and want change, they also are not knowledgeable enough about this campus and the way the system works. You can run as an outsider who is not part of the system, but should also know the logistics of Senate and of the K-State campus. Experience in other governmental bodies just is not enough.

In addition, their policies are mostly reactionary, and they have little vision for the future. They were outraged about fees that were passed this semester but had little input on how to approach next year's fees, where they could make a difference.

Board of Student Publications

THREE ONE-YEAR TERMS AND ONE TWO-YEAR TERM ARE AVAILABLE.

WE ENDORSE HILARY BAUGH, JASON BITTER AND MARK TOMB FOR ONE-YEAR SEATS.

Baugh wants to get involved at K-State and is sincerely interested in the board. We feel she would bring a fresh voice to the board and will be very open-minded about freedom of the press. With the increasing financial difficulties Student Publications Inc. has experienced, we endorse Bitter and Tomb. Bitter is a finance major who has also had experience in the paper industry. He wants to concentrate on the financial situation and will leave day-to-day control over the Collegian to the editors. Tomb worked extensively with the Board as chair of the Privilege Fee Committee this year. He has a great working knowledge of our financial situation and is willing to work to rectify it.

The other candidates did not have as strong a financial background, and one did not have enough working knowledge of the Collegian for us to endorse them.

WE ENDORSE RUSSELL FORTMEYER AS A WRITE-IN CANDIDATE FOR THE TWO-YEAR TERM.

The candidate on the ballot did not appear for the interview, so we are urging students to write in Russell Fortmeyer for the two-year term on the board. Fortmeyer has had great leadership experience, working both as a Student Senate intern and as a senator for two years. He has written for the Collegian for several semesters and knows the day-to-day operations of Student Publications. That combination would make him a great force on the board, as he would be able to balance both the needs of students and the needs of the staff members of the Collegian and Royal Purple.

Please remember, his name must be spelled correctly in order for the vote to count.

Baugh

Bitter

Tomb

Fortmeyer

Fine Arts Council

THREE ONE-YEAR TERMS ARE AVAILABLE.

WE ENDORSE CHRIS AVILA, STEPHANIE SAPIENZA AND WENDY STREVEY.

Again, Avila is knowledgeable and knows a great deal about the financial aspects of the Fine Arts Council. Sapienza has good ideas about promoting activities and has good contacts with the arts community through her leadership with the UPC Kaleidoscope films committee. Strevey is a fine arts major and has very specific plans for what she would do with the office, including getting more student input.

While the other candidates were strong and sincere in their interest in the arts, they were just not as knowledgeable about FAC as the other candidates were.

Avila

Sapienza

Strevey

Union Governing Board

FOUR ONE-YEAR TERMS AND TWO TWO-YEAR TERMS ARE AVAILABLE.

WE ENDORSE PATRICK CARNEY, CHRISTY DRAKE, MIKE HODGSON AND WENDY STREVEY FOR THE ONE-YEAR TERMS.

Both Carney and Drake currently serve on Union Governing Board. They both are experienced leaders who can continue to make a difference in UGB. They both have solid ideas, and Carney wants to create a reserve account so the next Union expansion does not have to come out of students' pockets.

Hodgson and Strevey would be new to the board, but they both have leadership experience in other areas — Union Program Council and Student Senate respectively. They both strongly emphasized the need to survey students to find out what they want from the Union. They both had good, specific ideas to implement in UGB.

WE ENDORSE CHRIS AVILA AND LEIGH TEAGARDEN FOR THE TWO-YEAR TERMS.

Avila has had tremendous experience through his work with Student Senate. He is knowledgeable of the workings of UGB and has good ideas as well as thoughts on how to implement them. While Teagarden does not have experience, she does bring a fresh perspective and good ideas. She shows great commitment, as well as a desire to get involved, by running for a two-year slot.

▶ VOTE FOR CANDIDATES OPEN TO PROGRESS

Editor,
Seeing that student body presidential elections are around the corner, it appears especially important that we address issues which threaten the students of this campus. Of particular importance is the fairy-tale myth being perpetuated by some people of the supposed need to limit fee increases at all costs. This "no more fees mentality" resembles a fairy tale because its proponents are much like the scarecrow looking for a brain in a make-believe land called Oz.

I, too, would love to live in a place where the cost of living didn't increase from year to year and things never changed, but my 3-year-old sister could even tell you that such a place doesn't exist. To assume we shouldn't increase student fees because it increases the price of school is to assume no other university around the nation is also increasing its fees. We all know that isn't true. If we are to remain competitive as a university and continue to provide services that are vital to the students, it is important we open our eyes to the realities of increasing demands.

To "just say no" to increased fees will significantly harm many services on campus. If we take this approach, services at Lafene Health Center will be cut, McCain performances will dwindle, athletic ticket prices will go up, and several other negative effects will be felt all through campus. The Collegian has already become victim of this recent trend, and next year everybody will understand how this backwards thinking truly hurts the students.

I would urge all of you on election day to vote for leaders whose minds aren't closed to progress, even if that means fee increases. We need a student body president who understands it is foolish to try to create a world where fees don't go up. Those candidates who advocate ending fee increases merely lack the leadership it takes to explain to the students why a fee increase may be needed at the risk of becoming unpopular.

So while the land of Oz might be a great place to live, anybody over the age of 10 knows that there is no such place. Unfortunately, there are some scarecrows with heads stuffed with straw running for student government who would like to create such a place by ending fee increases. So don't be fooled by the stories some candidates are telling you, but instead vote for strong leaders who have a vision of the future and not a glimpse of the past.

▶ DON'T JUST COMPLAIN, GET INVOLVED BY VOTING

Editor,
I am not a member of the Student Governing Association, but I have attended all its meetings this semester save four. Therefore, I feel I have some grounds to write this letter.

It seems there is an overabundance of people who are more than willing to complain about their representation in SGA. For that matter, the complaints of poor representation go across the entire government spectrum.

We often hear the media (including the Collegian) reporting about how you and I are disgusted with the lack of good candidates to represent us. My question is if the candidates are so bad, and we are so good, then why don't we get more involved ourselves? I am afraid the sad answer is that you and I are just not that ambitious.

I have seen your elected members of SGA in action enough to know the majority of them put in a lot of long and thankless hours. During one meeting, I witnessed the debate over Lafene Health Center's funding go on for five hours, and at 1 a.m. it was still going strong.

Additionally, each senator is on at least one committee, which takes up another night each week. Furthermore, every senator had to pull the same course load as you and I do.

To top it all off, they don't receive any pay for their work.

I would guess some of you are now thinking, "Well, regardless, my heart doesn't bleed for them because they don't vote the way I want them to, so they aren't representing me." I have two responses to that.

First, get out there and vote for the candidates who best reflect the majority of your views. Notice, I did not say to vote for the candidate you entirely agree with. This is because you are the only person who agrees 100 percent with you on every issue. Unfortunately, you are not running for office.

Second, you might consider getting directly involved yourself. If you cannot make the commitment to hold a Senate seat, you could go to a meeting once in a while and voice your opinion once in a while. The meetings are at 7 p.m. Thursdays in the Big 8 Room of the K-State Student Union.

If you cannot do that, then voice your opinion via e-mail. Senators' names and addresses are published in the Office of Student Activities and Services in the Union, just as the meeting schedules and agendas are. The agenda is also printed in the Collegian every Thursday.

Now I can imagine you saying, "Yes, but the senators do not care what I think." Au contraire. From what I have been able to gather, during the recent debates on fee increases, which concerned some of the hottest issues ever, many senators were on the fence and unsure which way to vote.

If a senator received a mere dozen calls or letters, that was a lot.

Since most people do not voice their opinions, the only thing these senators could base their decision on was their own best judgment or a measly dozen letters to represent the opinions of 300 constituents.

Since all students can complain or use the SGA as a scapegoat for their woes, I challenge the student body to initiate a new course of action.

First, let's blow the lids off the ballot boxes April 9 and 10. Let us make the voter turnout the highest ever.

Second, I appeal to you to get involved and not just blame the senators. Self-government works best when the self gets involved with the government.

▶ SGA NEEDS OPEN-MINDED PEOPLE TO WORK TOGETHER

Editor,
Student government elections are coming up next week, and we are faced with the decision of who to vote for. I would like to encourage students to get out and vote for the candidates they feel will best represent them for Senate, student body president and vice president, Union Governing Board, college councils, the Board of Student Publications and the Fine Arts Council.

But I would like to ask students to think about a few critical points in making their decisions. In the past, we have been forced to deal with a split student government. The executive and legislative branches have not been working toward the same goals, the good of the student body. Instead, the leadership in student government has met students with a closed mind and personal agenda that has prevented the executive and legislative branches from working together successfully.

What we need in student government is open-mindedness. Our executive and legislative branches need to be filled with people who are open to new ideas, who can put aside their own self-interests and who can put aside their own beliefs and prejudices in order to work for the students at K-State.

I encourage everyone to attend the student body presidential and vice presidential debates and ask the candidates how they intend to represent the students of this campus.

▶ BOTH SIDES OF COLUMN SHOULD BE PRINTED

Editor,

I would like to debate the column in Monday's edition of the Collegian by Jason Hamilton. In this column, Hamilton expresses his views against Christianity and how God cannot be that great since there is so much "evil and sin and meatloaf." Hamilton is entitled to his own personal beliefs, and I respect that. However, if his opinions are going to be published, I believe it is necessary to provide the readers with both sides of the story.

First of all, I would like to address the principle of freedom. Hamilton stated if he were God, he would "change evil people into good people with the snap of his holy finger." He was correct in the fact God could do that if he wanted to, but God chose rather to give humankind the freedom to select its own fate. For instance, Hamilton, if God forced everyone to be Christians, you would have to be a Christian whether you wanted to or not.

Hamilton asked the "believers" to question why the world has sin. God did not create sin; the devil did. Satan is the root of all evil. Anyone who has watched Saturday morning cartoons should be able to understand this concept.

When a character is wondering what to do, there appear two small versions of the character in an angel form and a devil form, each telling the character what to do.

This is an amusing but realistic interpretation of the situation. When confronted with a decision in life, we all make the choice ourselves on what to do in the matter. If we choose to do what the "little devil" is telling us, it is by our own hand. God did not make us sin.

I would also like to comment on the list of things Hamilton would do differently if he were God. I realize most of these might have been created for humor, so I will respond accordingly. Do you know how fat and lazy we would all be if we had everything just handed to us? There would be no motivation to do anything.

Seriously now, what about the Ten Commandments? "I would ditch the adultery one" was Hamilton's opinion. Do you mean to promote promiscuous lifestyles? With the number of sexually transmitted diseases out there today, everyone would be killed off within 20 years. (Just a wild estimate, but you should get the point.) God could cure AIDS and other diseases, but why should he always be responsible for what humankind has screwed up?

Hamilton also made a remark that everyone would "get a free pass to heaven" so we could all be happy whenever we wanted. Why would a non-believer want to go to heaven? This life on earth is all there is, and then it's over, right? If you want to go to heaven, live like God wants you to.

No one can prove it scientifically, so it is hard to believe for people who need the hard-core facts. Some say living a Christian life would mean giving up having fun. It is perfectly possible to lead a very happy and fulfilling life as a Christian. It just takes self-control.

The Christian lifestyle also has a good retirement plan.

▶ COLUMNIST CAN LEARN FROM BIBLE TEACHINGS

Editor,

I've just read Jason Hamilton's "Now, if I were God" three times, and I'm not sure how I feel. My initial response was the rage Jason referred to because of his blasphemy. A closer look, however, reveals obvious confusion, and I am reminded the God I serve is much bigger than any college newspaper's concept of who he is.

I do not feel the need to respond to each issue in his column because most of the answers he is looking for are easily found in the Bible. God did not create a brain that questions without any answers, but instead, he gave us his word as a "light unto our paths" (Psalm 119:105). He does, however, warn us that "He does great things which we cannot comprehend" (Job 37:5). In fact, God's response to Job's questioning (Job 38) is pretty amazing: "Who is this who darkens counsel by words without knowledge? Now, prepare yourself like a man; I will question you, and you shall answer Me. Where were you when I laid the foundations of the Earth? Tell Me, if you have understanding ... Shall the one who contends with the Almighty correct Him? He who rebukes God, let him answer it (Job 38:2-4, 40:2)."

Then notice Job's response to God in Job 42:1-3: "Then Job answered the Lord and said, I know that You can do everything and that no purpose of ours can be withheld from You. You asked, 'Who is this who hides counsel without knowledge?' Therefore I have uttered what I did not understand, things too wonderful for me, which I did not know."

One thing I do know is God, in his infinite love toward us, has given us the free passage into heaven that Hamilton talks about. God looked down on the sin man had chosen and had mercy on him. In an act that speaks volumes about his love for us, he sent his son to die on the cross for our sins.

Romans 5:8 says, "God demonstrates his own love for us, in that while we were still sinners, Christ died for us. Much more then, having been justified (being made right before God as a result of faith) by his blood, we shall be saved from wrath through him."

All we have to do is accept that free gift. Of course, that's where faith comes in.

▶ DRINKING URINE CAN BE A MEDICAL TREATMENT

Editor,

This letter is in regards to Scott Allen Miller's Smattering about drinking one's own urine. I personally know people who have used this therapy to cure skin problems, and also there is medical research to support this fact. Thus, I would advise Miller not to display his ignorance toward alternative medical sciences by keeping his gob shut.

Cats, Tigers tangle; Missouri swipes 2

Shana Newell
sports editor

It was not pretty. In fact, it was downright ugly. K-State's baseballers dropped two of this weekend's three games to Missouri with scores of 12-5 and 10-2 but were able to resurrect themselves Sunday for a 5-2 victory.

The Wildcats improved to 19-12 on the season and are 3-5 in conference play.

Pitchers Matt Koeman and Eric Yanz earned the losses for K-State. Koeman dropped to a 4-3 mark on the season with a 4.68 ERA. Yanz fell to 4-4 with a 4.99 ERA.

Coach Mike Clark said Missouri's ability to control the games was the main factor in the series.

"They took the momentum away from us," he said. "They jumped all over us with their offense."

And K-State responded — with near silence.

In the first game of the series, the Cats had five runs off 10 hits, but they stranded 13 runners on the bases.

In the second game, K-State had a season-low four hits and two runs scored. Catcher Mike Gardner, designated hitter David Hendrix and right-fielder Chris Hess supplied the Cats with their only hits. Hendrix and left fielder Ryan Buell drove in the Cats' two runs.

"We didn't fight back," Clark said. "They didn't have quality at-bats."

But K-State growled a little more in the third game of the series.

Earning Clark his 600th all-time win as a coach, the Cats pounded out five runs off 15 hits and held on to a late Tiger rally to clinch the victory.

Offensively the Cats were led by shortstop Heath Schesser and second baseman Scott Poepard. Schesser was 3-of-5 from the plate with one RBI and his 10th double of the season and his first triple while Poepard went 4-of-5 with one RBI. First baseman Jason Bichelmeyer also had a double, while Hess hit a solo shot out of the park — his fourth home run of the season.

"Chris (Traylor) really set the tone of the ballgame," Clark said. "He did a tremendous job taking their bats away."

Traylor headed into Sunday's competition holding the team best 3.95 ERA. Pitching six innings, giving up five hits and one run, Traylor struck out six while walking only one. He improved to 3-0 on the season with the win.

Offensively, Clark said the team still had work to do.

"We had a lot of hits, but we didn't execute in RBI situations," he said.

"We had some big two-out rallies, but we still need to work on it."

"It was a big win for us," Clark said. "Hopefully we can ride the momentum into our next game."

► WOMEN'S BASKETBALL

Search for coach continues

Dan Lewerenz
contributing writer

The search for a new women's basketball coach is almost through.

K-State assistant athletic director and senior women's administrator Cindy Fox said Friday the department would be inviting candidates to interview this week.

"We're getting close to the end," Fox said. "And there are some great candidates out there."

Former K-State coach Brian Agler was suspended Feb. 9 pending an investigation into alleged NCAA violations. He resigned Feb. 23 to take a position in the Office of the Vice President for Institutional Advancement.

"It's going to be an incredibly challenging position going into the Big 12. And Brian's will be hard shoes to fill. He was an excellent technical coach."

Great candidates — but great competition. With coaching jobs open at Oklahoma, California, Purdue and Virginia Commonwealth, there is a great number of people looking to make that next step. And K-State will have to fight with several other schools to sign the best available coach.

"I think it definitely opens people's eyes," Fox said of the openings, "but I'm not sure it's necessarily an advantage."

Not content to just let applications come in, Fox and Jim Epps, senior associate athletic director, made dozens of phone calls looking for strong applicants. Fox then did some preliminary interviews in Charlotte, N.C., while attending the Women's Final Four and Big 12 women's basketball meetings.

"You look for a lot of things in any of your employees," Fox said. "Good technical skills, a person capable of communicating with a number of individuals, someone who's ethical — especially in college athletics that's important."

With the April 10 spring signing deadline fast approaching, there is some urgency about filling the position.

"There definitely was with Oklahoma. And there is some urgency here as well," Fox said. "But we signed three great players in the fall period, and with only one scholarship available, it's not our top priority."

"We just want to get the best coach we can possibly get."

► TENNIS

Cats' netters continue winning, destroy Huskers and Cyclones

Shane McCormick
contributing writer

The K-State women's tennis team started off its Big 8 season on a positive note. On Friday, the Wildcats cruised to a smashing victory over the Nebraska Cornhuskers, 6-1.

The dual began with doubles competition. The Cats swept all three matches to gain the doubles point. At No. 1 doubles, senior Karina Kuregian and sophomore Lena Pilipchak served up a victory over Lisa Hart and Jennifer Thoste, 8-4.

At No. 2 doubles, sophomore Yana Dorodnova and junior Karen Nicholson improved their spring campaign with an 8-1 victory. Sophomore Dinah Watson and junior Nikki Lagerstrom rounded out the sweep with an 8-4 victory.

"Our doubles teams played some solid tennis today," coach Steve Bietau said. "They played within the range I expected them to."

In singles, the Cats took five out of six matches from the Cornhuskers. Dorodnova cruised to an easy victory at No. 1 singles.

She improved her spring record to 9-2 with a straight set victory, 6-1, 6-1.

Kuregian continued to be perfect in her spring campaign with a 6-2, 6-2 win over Hart. The win pushed Kuregian's record to 9-0.

The only loss of the day came at the No. 3 spot, where Nicholson suffered a tough loss to Annie Yang. After dropping the first set 7-5, Nicholson fought back in the second to tie the set at 6-

6. But Yang was able to prevail in the tie-breaker, 7-3.

Despite the loss, Bietau said he was pleased with Nicholson's performance.

"Karen played very well today," he said. "Yang has been their best player the past couple of years."

"Oddly enough, she has been out the past six weeks with Grave's disease, something we know a little bit about around here."

On Sunday, the Cats earned a second straight Big 8 win. The Cats posted a 7-0 rout of Iowa State.

For the second-straight dual, the Cats started off the match with a 3-0 sweep of their opponents. K-State's top team of Kuregian and Pilipchak posted an impressive 8-4 victory over Erika Asmuss and Angie Miller. At No. 2 doubles, Dorodnova and Nicholson were once again impressive, shutting out Krissy Rydell and Ann Backhaus 8-0.

Watson and Lagerstrom closed out the sweep with a hard-fought 9-7 victory over Mary Rumbaoa and Maggie Augustsson.

"Dinah and Nikki were stronger hitting the ball, but they just didn't move well," Bietau said. "Their movement today just wasn't sharp."

In singles competition the Cats dominated the Cyclones, taking all six matches.

At No. 1 singles, Dorodnova posted her 10th victory of the spring season. Dorodnova dominated Asmuss, 6-1, 6-2. At the No. 2 spot, Kuregian continued her perfect season with a 6-0, 6-0 rout of Rumbaoa.

At No. 3, Pilipchak won a tough match. She cruised in the first set of her match, taking the set, 6-0. But in the second, Miller was able to stay close with Pilipchak until finally losing the set, 5-7.

Due to an illness all week, this was Pilipchak's first singles match of the weekend.

"She hasn't been able to practice, but her pattern of play really didn't change much because of it," Bietau said. "She had a chance to break it open. She just didn't take advantage of it."

Nicholson bounced back from her loss Saturday to post an impressive 6-1, 6-1 victory. At the No. 6 spot, Lagerstrom defeated Molly Racette, 6-1, 6-3.

At No. 5, Watson continued her impressive comeback campaign. Watson cruised to a 6-0, 6-1 victory. After dropping the first two matches this spring, Watson has won six matches in a row.

Tennis coaches Steve Bietau and Monika Koblikova watch doubles matches on different courts at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex. K-State had matches against Nebraska and Iowa State the weekend.

► MANHATTAN DEPARTMENT OF PARKS AND RECREATION

Wanted: summer youth coaches

John Berggren
staff writer

The Manhattan Department of Parks and Recreation is calling on K-State students for help this summer with coaching for youth T-ball, softball and baseball leagues.

Students can coach grades one through 12 in the season which runs from mid-May until the end of July.

People interested in coaching can call Mike Buchanan at MDPR at 587-2757 or stop by the office in Manhattan City Park.

Buchanan said there were a few things people should know before applying.

"Generally teams play two games a week in the evening and practice at least once a week along with the games," Buchanan said. "We don't set limits on the practice schedules, and coaches schedule their own practices."

MDPR also asks students be somewhat dedicated to what they are doing.

"Students have to like to work with kids if they're thinking about signing up," Buchanan said. "It helps to know a little bit about the sport, and they should be committed to doing good."

"It can be a fun and enjoyable experience for both coaches and kids."

Current youth baseball coach and K-State student Chris Day, senior in secondary education, said he enjoyed coaching little league.

"I like being around the kids and the sport," Day said. "I'd like to someday coach baseball in high school, and it's a great way to be a part of the game when I'm not playing it."

Day also said coaches had to be dedicated to do well.

"It's a big commitment," Day said. "If you have an assistant coach it helps, but you have to be at all the games and practices."

Exhibits offer view of American art, eclectic collection

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art

Art history buffs be warned — the Nelson-Atkins Museum of Art is showing the exhibition "Made in America: Ten Centuries of American Art," a sweeping glance at the variety of art produced in America for the past millennium.

The exhibit spans 11th-century pottery by Anasazi artists to Andy Warhol's 1960s pop icon of Elvis Presley. It is a great way to receive a quick mini-education of American art — and see some fine works in the process.

With more than 150 artists represented, such as Mary Cassatt, John Singer Sargent, Robert Rauschenberg and Thomas Eakins, it is a diverse show. There is everything from a tea service crafted by Paul Revere II to photographs by Gordon Parks (who is well-represented in the K-State art collection).

However, the exhibit does well to include lesser-known artists whose works have helped create a national artistic common thread.

The show continues through May 19. The Nelson-Atkins is located in Kansas City, Mo., at 4525 Oak Street, just south of the Country Club Plaza.

The museum's hours are from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. Tuesday through Thursday, from 10 a.m. to 9 p.m. Friday; from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Saturday and from 1 to 5 p.m. Sunday. Admission is $4 for adults and $2 for students with ID. Admission is free on Saturdays. For more information, call (816) 751-ART.

Wichita Art Museum

The private art collection of Wichitan, local-boy-does-good, William "Bill" I. Koch is offered at the Wichita Art Museum.

Surely everyone has seen the wacky Bill's Stuff television commercials advertising the event like it is the return of King Tut's treasures, but do not be fooled.

The exhibit, "A Personal Gathering: Paintings and Sculpture from the Collection of William I. Koch," runs through May 19 — luckily. The show is a mishmash of collectibles Koch has collected throughout the years.

While some of the collection is truly worthy, such as a few Impressionist works by Monet, Cezanne and Renoir and some 20th-century works, the whole of it hardly ranks as museum quality.

The exhibit is arranged, somewhat questionably, in different category groupings. There is the maritime room, which would be better placed in Koch's Wichita Boathouse than in WAM.

The Western Room, poorly lit in an attempt at drama, boasts bronzes by Frederic Remington and paintings by Charles Russell.

The other groupings, however, lack coherence. Koch's eclectic collection is basically works bought on whims peppered with a few big names to spice up the appeal to a wider audience.

One begins to wonder if WAM is showing the exhibit out of choice or if Koch's financing was too much to pass up. Either way, you are better off heading to Kansas City to quench your artistic hunger.

WAM, 619 Stackman Drive, across the Arkansas River from Downtown, is open from 10 a.m. to 5 p.m. Tuesday through Saturday and from noon to 5 p.m. Sunday. Admission is free. For more information, call (316) 268-4921.

Artist visits new art museum

Rick Druse
staff writer

An artist dressed in a rust-orange shirt, lime-green pants and paint-splattered boots gave the first artist presentation for the Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art Friday.

Dale Chihuly, a glass artist from Seattle, presented a slide show of his glass sculptures to an audience of art museum supporters.

"This is basically our first program," said Katharine Walker, education coordinator for the Beach art museum.

Walker said Chihuly was brought to K-State because he is going to sculpt a glass chandelier for the museum. She said it was important to bring Chihuly to campus so he could get a feel for the art museum.

Chihuly and architect Arthur Andersson of Moore/Andersson Architects from Austin, Texas, toured the art museum Thursday afternoon, and Chihuly picked the spot for his sculpture.

Andersson said the chandelier will hang in a glass bay by the entrance of the museum that faces Aggieville. The chandelier will be able to be seen from the inside and the outside of the bay.

Chihuly said he was not quite sure what the shape or the color of the chandelier will be yet, but he said it will be 10 to 12 feet in height and hang from the ceiling in the glass bay.

McVeigh maintains innocence in bombing

Associated Press

NEW YORK — Oklahoma City bombing suspect Timothy McVeigh said he's never touched a bomb and wants to testify at his trial so "jurors know me and not what they've read," Time magazine reported.

"People have to realize that 90 percent of the case that people think they have, it has all been through non-verifiable leaks," McVeigh said in the magazine's April 15 issue, due on newsstands today.

"And I think you would be surprised how much those leaks are bogus. Especially through eyewitnesses," he said.

The interview with McVeigh took place in a federal prison in Oklahoma last month just before he and fellow suspect Terry Nichols were transferred to Colorado, where their trial will be.

In the interview, McVeigh maintained his innocence in the April 19, 1995, bombing of the Alfred P. Murrah federal building that killed 168 people and injured more than 500.

McVeigh and Nichols face the death penalty if convicted of federal murder and conspiracy charges.

According to Time, McVeigh refused to discuss specific evidence or disclose where he was on the morning of the bombing, saying, "we're saving that for the trial."

But he did deny that he ever built a bomb. "I've never had my hand on one. I used to watch other people do it. I won't go into that," McVeigh said. "There were plastic soda bottles. They would put vinegar and baking soda in and screw the cap on, and it would burst."

The Los Angeles Times reported last year that Nichols told federal authorities he and McVeigh learned how to make bombs while they were selling military surplus items at gun shows around the country in 1994 and 1995.

It has not been determined yet how much money was made at the fund-raising event.

The food was the highlight of International Nite for Mio Nakamura, senior in restaurant management.

"It was so interesting to enjoy another culture and taste their food," Nakamura said.

Donnette Holloway, sophomore in social work, said learning from others helped her learn about herself.

"I feel that events of this nature are important to the campus because they give us a chance to display our own culture and give us a chance to be exposed to and learn about others through song and dance," Holloway said.

Picking the international food to be served was a difficult task for Shin Gomita, senior in secondary education/English.

This year's menu included honey chicken from China; a fried dumpling with potato, onion and peas and a tomato sauce from India called bonda; pulao, a rice dish from Bangladesh and German mug cake.

"We just tried to come up with something that's not just from one country, but from different countries. And those are the items that we had tonight. These were the ones we thought were not so difficult to make and people liked," Gomita said.

Nabecha Kazi, president of the International Coordinating Council, said she was pleased with the night and said it was a success.

"This was the first time that we tried to make the most of whatever we had, and I think it turned out really well."

around the world. His work is on exhibit in more than 80 museums across that country. He has done sculpting projects in Nuutajarvi, Finland; Waterford, Ireland; and Monterey, Mexico. In 1997, he plans to create chandeliers and hang them over the canals of Venice.

Chihuly said his chandeliers can consist of 500 to 3,000 pieces of blown glass. Each piece of glass is hand blown and colored by Chihuly and his team of workers. Then they are wired to a metal frame to create the chandelier.

"Glass is always a tremendous secrecy," Chihuly said.

He said it is a secrecy because you can never tell what the glass is going to do or look like.

tuition," LeDoux said.

He said students should be allowed to vote about increases in student fees before the decisions are made. Another topic important to them was publishing teacher evaluations. They said they want to make it possible to pick up teacher evaluations when going through enrollment.

Hansen also wanted to make teacher evaluations public. He said he felt the students never get to see any results of the evaluations and by publishing them students could get some use out of them. He mentioned one way to make them public was to put them on the World Wide Web.

"We never get to see any tangible results from the teacher evaluations," Hansen said.

Another issue important to Hansen and Otto was campus safety. They said they want to focus on cameras on campus. Hansen said there are only 12 cameras on campus, including nine in the parking lots, which are all old. They said they want the extra cameras to supplement the improvements that have been made in improved campus lighting and escort services.

Horsefeathers' emphasis was returning government back to the students.

"I feel student government disregards student referendums. That won't happen under me," Horsefeathers said.

He also addressed campus safety, although he said he wasn't sure of how to achieve it.

Another big topic addressed was how to get residence halls involved and keep them informed about government issues.

Hansen and Otto said they were disappointed in past years when officers involved before the election were never seen again after they were elected. They vowed not to do that and said they would have re-visitations throughout the year with the students.

Opening up Homecoming was another way Hansen and Otto felt residence halls could be more involved. They said they felt the whole campus should be involved in Homecoming rather than dominated by fraternities and sororities.

"I'd really like to see that effort refocused," Hansen said.

Horsefeathers said he felt that problem wouldn't be difficult to deal with. "This can be done with real simple methods, like with things we're doing tonight," he said.

Horsefeathers said although it was not something he had thought about, he also like the idea of opening up Homecoming.

demand of commodity markets, rather than the intricacies and demands of government programs.

But until 2002, eligible farmers will receive payments regardless of the market prices of wheat, corn, animal feed, grains, cotton and rice. And they also will no longer have to idle land to control supply.

"This is historic legislation," said Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., also Senate majority leader and Republican presidential candidate.

This is a complete departure from the past, Dole said.

The change in agriculture policy is as much a reflection of political changes in Congress as it is of global markets and farm life itself, Roberts said.

Farmers will be able to pencil out with their lender where they are going to be and make some long-term planting decisions, Roberts said.

One of the big changes under the new legislation is crop insurance. Catastrophic crop insurance, which had been required to receive a subsidy, will become optional, but farmers will have to sign a waiver to decline it.

This is a good thing for farmers in Kansas, since winter 1995 and 1996 has been extremely dry, which has threatened this year's winter wheat crops.

That could mean continued high prices this year, and under the new payment system, the subsidies will not fall as the price increases.

"It will come at a very opportune time as far as the weather stress we are facing," Roberts said. "I think the farmer would appreciate a good rain as much as anything else."

Kaczynski's brother, David, led authorities to his brother after he found old writings of Theodore's that resembled the Unabomber's 35,000-word manifesto in the family house in suburban Chicago.

David Kaczynski initially tried to Tony Bisceglie, the Washington lawyer who acted as an intermediary between David Kaczynski and the FBI, said he would have a news conference at 10 a.m. today in Washington, D.C.

The Kaczynski family will not attend the news conference and will not speak with reporters, he said.

Professor evaluations and campus security were the main topics of a student body presidential debate sponsored by Union Program Council Monday afternoon.

All three presidential tickets attending the debate agreed teacher evaluation forms completed by students should be made public.

Brent Wiedeman, vice presidential candidate and senior in agricultural education, said making the evaluations public is common sense, and should have happened a long time ago.

"When you go to buy a car you know everything about it. We as consumers are buying an education, which is more important," he said.

Chris Hansen, presidential candidate, said teacher evaluations after professors reach tenure provide a means for accountability.

The candidates each had different views on how to distribute the evaluations.

Hansen proposed using the World Wide Web, as well as placing copies of evaluations on reserve in Farrell Library.

Hiram H. Horsefeathers, (Joshua Baze) candidate for president and junior in advertising, said he agreed the evaluations should be made public.

"As for distribution, we would have them dropped out of an airplane over campus," he said.

Chuck Haynes, graduate student in accounting, asked the candidates how they proposed convincing Faculty Senate to agree with making the evaluations public.

Aaron Otto, junior in political science and general management and vice presidential candidate, said Faculty Senate should be able to give input.

"We'd take the resolution passed by Student Senate and work with Faculty Senate," he said.

Trent LeDoux, senior in animal science and presidential candidate, said he agreed Faculty Senate would need to get involved.

"We need to get their input because they are the professionals," he said.

Horsefeathers said he would have to learn more about the issue

BSU to elect executive board today

Rhonda A. Lee
staff reporter

Black Student Union will have elections for its executive board positions from 6:50 p.m. to 7:40 p.m. today in the K-State Student Union 212 during its monthly general meeting.

Shannon Stone, current recording secretary and co-chairwoman on the elections committee for BSU, said there are still seven positions open on the executive board.

The positions open are vice president, administrative secretary, recording secretary, parliamentarian and directors of public relations, social events and special events. Write-in candidates will be allowed on the ballot.

This year, the treasurer's position has been divided into two separate positions — inside and outside account specialists.

"One will handle mainly the internal accounts such as our general account and our scholarship fund. The outside accountant handles the monies we receive from SGA and any big block-type things that we get from the University," Stone said.

A referendum will be added to this year's ballot asking voters if they will support an increase of membership dues from the present $1 to $5.

► Candidates for the executive board:

Gemini Pankey, president; Chris Avila and Christina Daniels, outside accounts specialists; Tanisha Woodard, director of education; and Stacy Yeager, inside accounts specialist.

College hires dean after long search

Sara Edwards
staff writer

A lengthy search process for a new dean for the College of Architecture, Planning and Design has come to an end.

Dennis Law, who has served as the college's interim dean since last September, has been appointed as the new dean.

Law said the search process began about a year ago. He said he is in the process of getting a contract.

"Dean Law was a very strong choice. He was supported by people inside the University and out. We feel good about the selection," Provost James Coffman said.

Law said one of the main challenges he will face is trying to rebuild the spending base. He said he will try to cut administrative costs.

"We're trying to do more with less," he said. "The infrastructure has deteriorated quite a bit in the past few years."

Coffman said many institutions of higher learning across the country, including K-State, have constricted resources.

He said Law's ability to focus on priorities and work with people would help him to face this problem.

Law said in many ways, the job of dean will be similar to his past position as head of the Department of Landscape Architecture.

"There are many similarities. The level of responsibility is different," he said.

Law said he would still be responsible for helping students and upholding University policy, but he would be responsible to several disciplines.

"I think to be responsible to the entire college is an awesome responsibility," he said.

► UNABOMBER

Former colleagues recall little about suspect's past at Michigan

Laurie Mayk
The Michigan Daily

The man arrested as the infamous Unabomber last week left his legacy at the University of Michigan in formulas and in mathematics journals, but not in the memories of his peers and colleagues.

FBI agents arrested Theodore John Kaczynski, who earned two degrees in mathematics from the University in the 1960s, in his Montana cabin Wednesday and charged him with possessing a partly made bomb.

Following an extensive search of the cabin's brown boxes, diagrams and explosive materials, law enforcement officials said Kaczynski may be the Unabomber whose mail bombs injured more than 23 people across the country.

Neither Kaczynski's classmates nor his professors offered much more than hazy recollections of his presence at the university.

"The math department was not very big in those days," said Alan Heezen, who took classes in the department at the same time as Kaczynski. "I expected to recognize him, but his face nor his name rang any bells."

Michigan University faculty members who worked with Kaczynski remembered an independence in Kaczynski and described him as meticulous and analytical.

Suspect linked to bombs sent from California

Kaczynski

Associated Press

HELENA, Mont. (AP) — Federal investigators have placed Unabomber suspect Theodore Kaczynski in Northern California on dates when bombs were mailed from the region, a law enforcement source said today.

The last four bombs from the Unabomber were mailed from Northern California, including two postmarked in Sacramento.

The source, who spoke on condition of anonymity, cautioned that investigators were still going through records.

In Washington today, the lawyer who told the FBI of the Kaczynski family's suspicions said they never sought assurances that the government would waive the death penalty.

Kaczynski's mother wasn't told of the suspicions until about two weeks ago, said Tony Bisceglie, lawyer for Kaczynski's brother, David.

"She expressed her sincere belief that Ted could not be the Unabomber, but if it was, he must be stopped," Bisceglie told reporters.

David Kaczynski tipped authorities after noticing his brother's old writings were similar to the Unabomber's anti-technology manifestos, the lawyer said.

"There were similarities in ideology, phraseology and the spelling of certain words," Bisceglie said. "I think that David is in shock. I think that David thinks that his brother was involved."

He said the family didn't know about the government's $1 million reward.

Investigators building a case against Kaczynski are searching the country for evidence that the reclusive former math professor left his tar-paper shack near the Continental Divide to mail or leave bombs in other states.

Agents searching the Montana cabin have found evidence directly linking him to one of the bombings, the Los Angeles Times reported.

SOME CANDIDATES MIGHT NEED TO MEET SENATE APPROVAL IF ELECTED

About 40 candidates who are running for various offices in this year's Student Governing Association elections, if elected, will not be able to take office unless Student Senate gives them a two-thirds vote.

The candidates missed the April 5 filing deadline for expenditure reports in the Office of Student Activities and Services.

Last year, Senate had to vote candidates out of office if the candidates had election violations. To enforce stricter punishments, the Elections Committee changed the grievances to an automatic removal if a candidate was in violation.

The Elections Committee might propose what action should be taken against candidates who have election violations after the elections are over, Chad Schneider, Elections Committee chairman, said.

He said the Elections Committee will probably recommend that candidates with multiple violations not be able to take office.

Many of the candidates who did not turn in their expenditure reports also failed to appear at one of the two mandatory meetings March 19 and 20. Guidelines of the election were reviewed at the mandatory meetings, including the consequences of failing to return an expenditure report by the deadline.

Schneider said he believes candidates who fail to meet deadlines should not be allowed into office.

"If you're going to be in Senate, you should have the timeliness to turn things in," he said. "If they can't turn in their stuff, I don't think they should be in Senate or any other office."

SURVIVORS OF MASSACRE EMERGE AFTER 9 MONTHS OF HIDING

SAHMERI, Bosnia-Herzegovina (AP) — "Don't cry, my mother," the 16-year-old Muslim youth said as the two embraced, reunited nine months after the massacre at Srebrenica — a town that has come to symbolize the horror and suffering of Bosnia's war.

Bekir Husejinovic was one of six people to emerge from hiding in the past few days, stunning relatives who had assumed them dead.

"Is it the truth that my son is alive?" his mother, Zineta Husejinovic, cried. "I can't believe my son is in front of me."

The Muslim enclave fell to the Serbs in July, and thousands of men are believed to have been hunted down and slaughtered. Bekir and five others arrived in government-controlled territory only Saturday, telling reporters and local TV stations that they survived for nine months by hiding in bunkers just a couple of miles from Srebrenica and eating corn kernels and potatoes.

Their extraordinary story comes just as spring's thaw is uncovering suspected mass grave sites.

War crimes investigators are collecting evidence at several sites believed to hold the remains of hundreds of men who eyewitnesses said were marched away from Srebrenica and systematically executed.

Most estimates are that the bodies of 7,000 men await discovery.

The wonder of it all

■ Museum provides interactive learning for children

■ story by Jill Story

A bright, paper butterfly hovers in the air over a scene of happy chaos at Wonder Workshop Children's Museum in downtown Manhattan.

Walls plastered with children's artwork surround the colorful exhibits and the children are so busy having fun, they do not realize how much they are learning — history, science, art appreciation and responsibility.

"I work here. I'm a vol—un—teer," Manal Kara said, flipping her chocolate-colored curls over her shoulder and giggling.

And what is her job description like?

"Well, I pet the animals and help people get stuff like clay or paints. When the phone rings, sometimes I say 'Hello, Wonder Workshop.' It's a good job," said Kara, a fifth-grader at Theodore Roosevelt Elementary.

The not-for-profit museum, 409 Poyntz Ave., is co-directed by Richard and Cindy Pitts.

"This is a hands-on museum. Most museums want to preserve everything. We want kids to come in here and touch stuff. They have a great time and don't realize that they're learning, but they are," Richard Pitts said.

Cindy Pitts teaches the fourth, fifth and sixth grade behavioral disorder classes at Amanda Arnold Elementary. As a teacher, she wanted to find new ways to connect with children who the school system labeled unteachable, her husband said.

She started Wonder Workshop in 1989 because she thought there might be other kids in the community who might enjoy learning through their hands on interactive experience.

The museum's brochure explains it this way — "Wonder Workshop Children's Museum provides fun, interactive learning experiences and environments where youth, adolescents and their families come together to explore, discover, and create through exhibits and programs in the arts, sciences and humanities."

According to the children, the giant bubble machine and the animals are the favorite attractions.

The green and yellow bubble machine allows a child to stand on a platform and pull a rope, which raises a bubble solution covered hula hoop. The result is a giant bubble cylinder surrounding the delighted child.

FAMILY FUN

► The museum is open Tuesday through Sunday, and hours vary daily. Admission is $2 per child. Children younger than 9 must have a parent accompanying them. For more information, contact Richard Pitts at 776-1234.

"It goes all the way over your head sometimes," said Thomas Oldfather, a fourth-grader at Woodrow Wilson Elementary.

A menagerie of animals and insects is next to the bubble machine, including among other things, an iguana, several tarantulas, Madagascar Hissing Roaches, a large white rabbit and a ring-necked dove.

Lacey Gant, a fourth-grader at Theodore Roosevelt, said she likes to conduct tours of the animal section of the museum for newcomers.

"I like the dove the best. When it's really quiet in here you can hear him cooing," said Gant, crouching with her neck outstretched and demonstrating the sound, her arms folded like wings next to her body.

The bird responded, sounding much like her imitation and she smiles triumphantly before moving on to the next cage.

Across the room at the work area, constructed to look like a bird house, Marlatt Elementary second grader David Bowden is working on a squirrel feeder. As he nails two pieces of wood together he explains that this is his second feeder. The first one is hanging on the pine tree in his back yard.

"I'll hang this one in the front yard," he said shyly.

Behind the scenes, helping small fingers with their tasks, are Richard Pitts and his volunteers.

Ashley Giefer, sophomore in criminology, said, "This is a great place for the kids to be creative. There are so many activities for them."

There are examples of the children's artwork all over the museum, including paintings, woodcarvings and sculpture.

"Yeah, we get to take all this stuff we make home," said Jordan Potter, a Theodore Roosevelt fourth-grader. He was fashioning a mask out of clay.

spinning it with his foot and trying for the third time to finish his pencil holder, which he just can't get quite right.

"I taught myself to do this, which is why it looks like it does," he said, shaking his head in mock-seriousness.

As the children swarm from one activity to the next, Richard Pitts and his volunteers keep a watchful eye on them all, while mixing paint, answering questions and guiding small hands in the various tasks.

"Thank God for the volunteers," he said.

If there is one thing the museum needs, it is more volunteers, Richard Pitts said. Most of his volunteers are K-State students who work at the museum as part of a class project every semester.

"What we really need is people from the community for the summer. The students won't be here, and we will be very busy," he said.

"We have a real variety of kids — every race, every economic background, every temperament."

And for every one of those children, there is some activity at Wonder Workshop that fascinates them.

Besides its exhibits, the museum offers after school clubs, a "backpack theatre troupe" and mentoring programs. There are also computer opportunities, field trips and birthday party packages, and Studio 10/15, an arts and recording studio for children.

T.J. Tryphonas, third-grader at Eugene Field School, worked on a clay project at the Wonder Workshop last Thursday. Many area elementary students were at the workshop that day because of teacher in-service days.

There's no excuse not to vote in election

QUICKread

► Student elections are today and tomorrow. You must have your student ID, and no campaign material is allowed near the voting area. See Monday's Collegian for a voter's guide and the editorial board's candidate endorsements.

Find a few minutes today or tomorrow and let your voice on this campus be heard. It's time to get out and vote.

If you were upset about fees or other issues this year or in the past, this is your opportunity to vote for candidates who agree with your views.

Many important issues are present at K-State every year. It is important to elect someone who will listen to the voices of concerned students and make something happen. A good student body president will maintain frequent contact between students and administration, faculty senate and the city.

Before you vote, research campus issues. Many of the candidates have home pages. Check them out. Call the candidates. Ask questions. Find out what they stand for.

Take at least five or 10 minutes to look at the Collegian Voters' Guide. Read up on the candidates' views on fees, teacher evaluations and campus safety.

But don't feel compelled to vote for every open office. Vote only for who you believe is qualified. A random, uninformed vote for someone could be a vote against a strong, qualified candidate. Don't be afraid to leave something blank. The ballots don't have to be filled out completely to count.

There are a few things you need to remember. To vote, you must have your student ID. No campaign material is allowed in voting areas. Be sure to put your Voters' Guide away after you get a good look at it. They can't be taken to the ballot boxes.

In the last four years, voter turnout has been about 15-18 percent. Let's get that number up. You don't really have the right to complain after the fact if you don't vote this week.

HOME-GROWN TERRORISM

Like most of the people around me, I grew up thinking America was the place to be. I felt like this was a free, safe and stable nation.

I heard about wars, terrorism and injustice in other countries, but, it was all in other, far way countries. They never seemed like things that would go on in the United States.

Lately, though, things have gotten a little weird. We've all heard about the Unabomber, some guy who has been sending mail bombs for 18 years for ideological reasons.

And, we've all heard about the Freemen, heard up in their Montana compound — ready to fight the FBI if they have to.

Not everybody heard about the house that blew up last Thursday in Oregon. Nobody was home, but a fire started somehow and set off a large amount of explosives, scattering bomb-parts, bullets and papers with bomb designs everywhere.

than invite Keyes, it changed the stage layout and the format of the debate so it would better suit a three-way debate.

Keyes was rightfully indignant and decided to show up anyway. When he did, the station asked him to leave. When he didn't, the station called the cops.

So there Keyes was, the black Republican candidate, getting handcuffed and hauled away. That image played on the national news for an afternoon. In Europe, though, the BBC and SkyNews gleefully played it for days.

That's the kind of image you might have expected to see coming out of South Africa in the '80s — not America in the '90s.

But our election process has never been pristine and pure, just monolithic and stable.

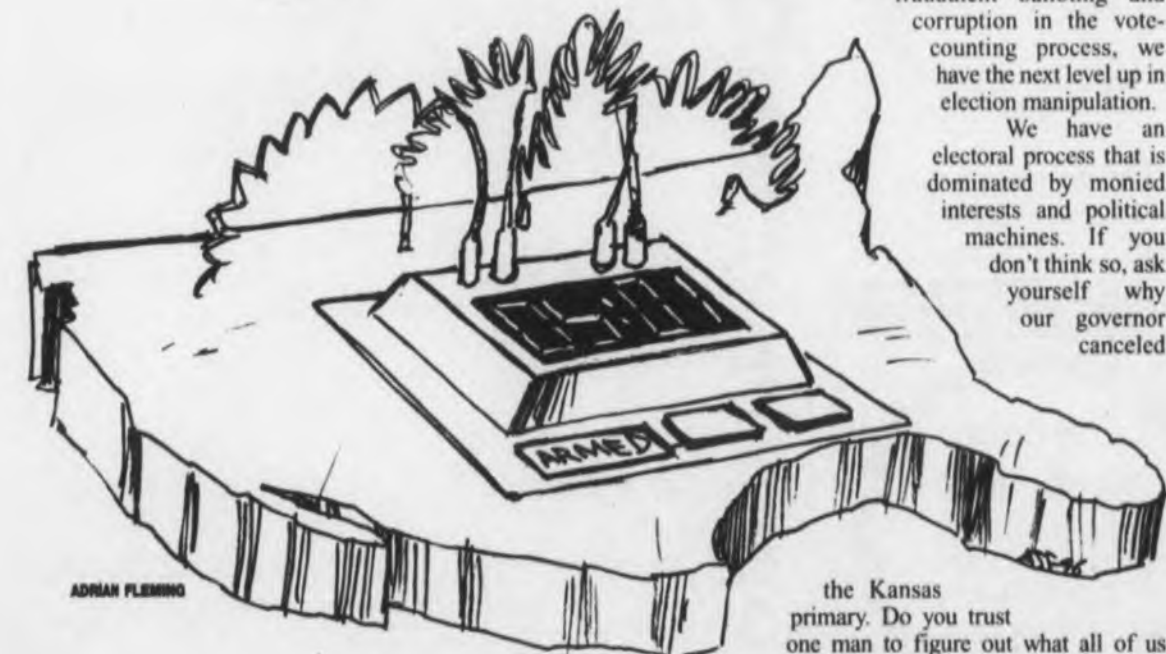

While we probably don't have fraudulent balloting and corruption in the vote-counting process, we have the next level up in election manipulation.

We have an electoral process that is dominated by monied interests and political machines. If you don't think so, ask yourself why our governor canceled

Add these instances to the Branch Davidian standoff/massacre in Waco, Texas, and the Oklahoma City bombing of last year. It sure seems like America has a full-blown domestic terrorism problem.

Terrorism just isn't something I'm used to worrying about in America. When somebody starts talking about bombs and "standoffs with government forces," I think of the Middle East, or China, or North Ireland.

I guess I shouldn't be surprised, though. My image of America was formed through indoctrination in school (most notably in a bunch of propaganda they called "social studies") and from the media.

This image didn't include terrorism, of course, and it didn't include the kinds of things that induce terrorism, either. In other words, I was taught that America was the most just and free place on earth.

It just isn't true. Other countries' national news media take great pleasure in reporting the types of things that go on in America in the same way that our media reports unrest in other countries.

For example, remember Alan Keyes? He is a black man who, until recently, was a candidate for the Republican presidential nomination. Earlier this year, a television station conducted a televised debate to which it invited the top four candidates. As number five, Keyes was not invited.

When Dole declined, however, the station decided to go with just the other three. Rather the Kansas primary. Do you trust one man to figure out what all of us think?

In other news:

■ Kansas is set to pass a law invalidating same-sex marriages from other states — marriage: a basically financial contract entered into by consenting adults.

■ The United States has police who beat up minorities. Rodney King's beating wasn't that long ago, and a few days ago we saw a repeat performance as police beat the hell out of Mexican immigrants. And those are just the ones who got caught on tape.

■ The United States is a prison system in which it is trying to lock up the entire black population of the inner cities. Prison construction is the fastest growing industry in our nation's cities.

Admittedly, the Freemen aren't concerned about all that, of course. For one thing, they're white, so they don't have much to fear from California police. No, the Freemen are upset about laws that make them pay taxes and laws that keep them from writing bad checks.

And the Unabomber is motivated by a ideology so irrational and convoluted that it might as well be a religion.

But if the real inequities and injustices in our country continue, our national image is bound to change. Soon, terrorism and revolutionary rhetoric might be a fact of life in the United States.

If so, we will have brought it on ourselves.

TOLES

The delight of obeying the law

I think I must not have been the only one thrown by the new speed limits during spring break travel. Like most people, I knew Interstate 70 would be just a little bit different, but that first new sign still gave me a jolt.

So what did I do? I sped up to 75 mph, until I saw that first car pulled over. That's always a sobering sight. At least, if you share my tremendous fear of getting a ticket, it is.

I slowed down to 70 mph — the speed I've always driven on the interstate — but it didn't feel cool any longer, because everybody kept passing me. When I saw different cars pulled over by the highway patrol, though, I had a little chuckle, and there were many little chuckles along the way.

On my return trip, I had an outright laugh. A little silver Mitsubishi Eclipse first whizzed past me a few miles west of Colby on I-70 East. Although it's hard to get a satisfying look when something goes by you that fast, I remember thinking what a gorgeous car it was.

Perhaps it was a little too eye-catching, because a couple of miles east of Oakley, I had my opportunity to take a better look. The Eclipse was sitting at the side of the road with a patrol car behind it. I chuckled, thinking that was the last I'd see of it.

But no, it wasn't too long before I spotted a little silver car growing rapidly in my driver's side mirror. Sure enough, the same silver Mitsubishi Eclipse pulled up again, and it appeared to be going even faster this time. Perhaps the driver was making up for the time he'd spent with the patrolman. What an idiot.

The Eclipse was next stopped three miles west of WaKeeney. I felt a little sorry for the driver. If indeed he did receive tickets both times, he had to be hurting, yet my malicious side was hoping neither patrol officers had shown any mercy.

In any case, I was positive the driver had learned his lesson this time. Even after my customary pit stop in Hays, I felt confident the Eclipse was crawling along somewhere far behind me at 60 mph. Thirty miles west of Salina, I had quite forgotten about the car and its fearless driver, but that was where he passed me once more.

This time I could only shake my head and smile. Maybe he had a radar detector, but if that were the case, he should have checked to make sure it was working. It struck me as funny that in about 200 miles of interstate, this speed demon had gotten no farther than a law-fearing driver like me.

My brains for arithmetic are pretty poor, but when I arrived back in Manhattan, I started setting up a little hypothetical problem. Supposing the Eclipse and my Sunbird had crossed an imaginary line simultaneously — the Eclipse at 80 mph and the Sunbird at 70 mph — and supposing neither car changed speeds, changed lanes, stopped in Hays for gas or got stopped by the highway patrol a couple of times. The Eclipse would've beaten the Sunbird to a second imaginary line 200 miles away by about 21 minutes and 36 seconds. Gee, just think of all the things the driver could accomplish in that extra time.

However, back in the real world, we crossed it at the same time, because there are real and unpredictable elements such as other cars, and highway patrolmen who aren't kidding around anymore. From what I've seen, the highway patrol has taken 70 mph to heart.

The driver of that silver Mitsubishi Eclipse has made me happy about this new strictness, too. Wherever he was headed, I hope he got stopped again — not because I'm wicked — but because I have this unpleasant suspicion that drivers who have such flagrant disregard for the law will have equally flagrant disregard for those with whom they share the road.

STUDENT GOVERNMENT PULLS HOUDINI ACT

Editor,

Recently there has been a lot of talk about the upcoming student elections — who's going to do what, what they promise, etc.

Let me just put forward a basic opinion. In the past four years my experience at K-State has been this: The student body president is a better disappearing act than Houdini. Let's conduct a joking poll of this. Everyone out there who can name your student body president and vice president by full name, please raise your hand.

What's that? I didn't even get half the campus? Oh well, maybe just a fluke. Everyone who is a senior — can you name anyone who was in office at least twice during your tenure here? Whoops. Lost a bunch there, too.

In four years of being here, watching from on campus and off, it is an absolute rarity to see someone step to the plate and try to say something about the student population that means anything. Two years ago I heard it. When Ed Skoog ran and said straightforwardly, "What's happening to students' off-campus apartments? They suck!" We knew he was speaking from a point of realism. Anyone who saw his living establishment knew that he was an average Joe who understood how crappy things could be.

But more and more, the student population seems alienated by our government. We seem to be represented by people who don't represent what we are. And let's get past that "I only vote for people in my department." Face facts — there are a lot of people in your department who also don't represent you.

I'm more than intrigued by the Horsefeathers/McCracken ticket. Partly because I know them — more importantly because they are saying something that rarely gets said: "We don't favor anyone. We'll talk to anyone. We'll try to be fair."

That suck-it-up mentality rarely gets heard. Everyone likes to make promises knowing people will forget and it will all be over. Here is someone saying people won't like some of this, but on the whole, it will be good. There is something to be said for being straightforward, not sucking up and not disappearing.

No matter how you vote in the upcoming elections, take the little self-poll above. Can you name your elected officials? If you can't, you probably ought to take time to vote for officials whose names you know and you can hold responsible, no matter who you think them to be.

The Houdini student government will exist as long as the student body keeps cheering for the rabbit-out-of-the-hat trick, instead of the description of how it is done.

NASB Native American Student Body

■ Native American group represents more than 15 different tribes story by Marci McNeal

Membership dues, attendance requirements and formal proceedings are often associated with student organizations at universities.

However, the Native American Student Body tends to have a less formal approach to its meetings.

"Our group is so close. We really get to know each other and learn about each other. It's like we're a real family," said Christy Honas, NASB social coordinator and senior in social work.

NASB has been an active group at K-State for seven years and continues to grow.

The group is open to all K-State students and also community members.

"This is an inter-tribal organization, and we welcome all tribes to come to our meetings," said Annette White, NASB secretary and senior in anthropology and American ethnic studies.

NASB has members who represent more than 15 tribes, including Navajo, Cherokee, Osage, Quapaw, Choctaw-Caddo, Laguna, Kiowa, Muskogee-Creek, Omaha, Shoshone-Banock, Lakota Sioux, Assiniboine-Sioux, Southern Ute, Iowa and Sac-Fox.

"We've also had non-native students who have joined our group in the past," said Clyde Henderson, director of minority's resource and research center and the NASB adviser.

Henderson said there have been different Native American groups in the past. He remembers seeing old fliers from the 1970s that were advertising events sponsored by Native American groups.

NASB meets every Wednesday night at 8 p.m. at 814 Haid Court.

"We have about 15 to 20 members of the NASB right now, and all we ask is that they show a general interest about the group," said Travis Blackbird, NASB president and sophomore undecided.

Blackbird said he first came to K-State just for his education and then he saw an ad for NASB and wanted to see how many people were involved with the group.

"I wasn't seeing any Native Americans with my class schedule, so I wanted to see some friendly faces from some people of my culture that I could identify with," Blackbird said.

NASB focuses a lot of its time and energy on the education and history of different Native American tribes.

"The Manhattan area was central for several native tribes," said LaVerne Bitsie, member of NASB and graduate student in mathematics.

Bitsie said it seems fitting to have a representation of Native Americans at the university level to educate both the students and the community.

"NASB allows us to learn a lot about ourselves and each other and the traditions that each of our tribes hold," White said. "We find out where we came from and who we are, all while educating ourselves and others around us."

NASB sponsors and participates in a variety of activities during the year, including handling all the activities during Native American Heritage

Native American

Month in April.

"We go through SGA to get allocations for two events in the fall," Henderson said. "We usually try to have a speaker, a dance group or another performing artist come to K-State to continue having Native American culture represented here."

Henderson said the group also worked in conjunction with the Manhattan Parks and Recreation Department to host a pow-wow in City Park.

"We'd really like to build on that since it was the first time that the Manhattan community put on such an event, so we hope to do it again next year," Henderson said.

Annette White, shown in foreground, and April Bowman model different tribal dress that they hand-crafted.

The biggest project that NASB handles is the Native American Heritage Month.

"To get every thing done for the month of April, we started planning last semester," Blackbird said.

Blackbird said the biggest project the group had to prepare for was the pow-wow, but the other activities planned are just as important.

"The pow-wow is the biggest thing we put together by far because it takes so much time, effort and money to put on," Blackbird said. "This activity seems to be the one big draw we get from the students and the community."

NASB also finds the participants for this month through members of the group.

"All the people we are bringing in to participate in Native American Heritage Month are people we know," White said.

The Fortmeyer Files

by Russell Fortmeyer

This week
Bernard Franklin
assistant dean of student life

Russell: You did your undergraduate work here and were student body president in the 1970s. You came back and were hired into the Dean of Student Life's office. Now, you're leaving us again. What do you consider your greatest accomplishment, now or then?

Bernard: The biggest thing would be personal accomplishment. For me, knowing where I came from, knowing our background, knowing what I was like personally — college has made a dramatic difference in my life.

Each time I come back here, I grow more and more. It will be six years, this summer since I came back, and I've seen a lot of growth in myself. I get more out of my work than I feel like I give to other people. I'm not trying to be cheesy, but I've thought a lot about it lately.

I feel like I'm ready for the next six years or whatever.

Russell: Your next step is with the National Center for Fathering in Kansas City.

MATT HAWKINS/Collegian

Bernard: I'm taking major leaps when you look at an environment that is pretty centrally-located in one region. My mission, now, will become national. In a lot of ways, I feel like I'm ready for that.

I feel like K-State has helped prepare me for that. Working with Pat and Susan (Pat Bosco and Susan Scott), who are probably two of the most professional managers-leaders-supervisors you could have, they've done a lot in shaping me.

Russell: How much has this campus changed, if any, since you were a student and since you've been back?

Bernard: Not much at all. A lot of my professors are still here. A lot of administrators are new, but that's probably the biggest change. Anderson is pretty changed, but the rest of campus is pretty much the same.

I sit and have conversations as colleagues with professors who were my instructors. It's real different.

Russell: If you were just graduating from high school this May, would you still be attracted to K-State? What brought you to K-State in the 1970s, and is it still there?

Bernard: Yes, I'm sure I would have. I know what we do, and I'm part of that. Two-tenths of my time is working with Pat in admissions, so I write a lot of letters.

Being an African-American kid and wondering if I'm going to go to an environment that is going to be comfortable, friendly, warm, caring? You betcha. K-State feels good. It felt good in the 1970s. There would be no question.

The only thing that would be an additional factor is whether or not my dad would let me go out of state. My parents wouldn't let me go out of state. I'm the oldest of seven. My dad said I had to stay in state. So, staying in state doesn't give you much of an option.

We lived six blocks from Wichita State. I was not gonna go to Hillside High, which is what we called it.

Russell: How did you wind up taking a job with the National Center for Fathering?

Bernard: Ken (Ken Canfield) and I, he's the national president, were in school together finishing out Ph.D.s together. He and I were in classes together.

One day we were talking about movies, and I suggested he go see "Boyz in the Hood." He said he had heard about it. I said, "You gotta see it." He said he thought it was too violent. I said, "Yeah, you've got to work through it because that's the reality. That's where a lot of our kids live, and that's the reality." He saw it and was intrigued.

I told him that's what I want to do — to help those young people. I wasn't saying it for him to hear it. He heard something in me and began pursuing me and has for two years. We just finally came together.

Russell: For the record, what position are you taking exactly?

Bernard: It's vice president and national director. The vice-president part is being a creator of research and programming material for men of color. The national-director part is I'll be one of the spokespersons for the center for the national media.

Russell: How much of a change will moving to Kansas City be for you and your family?

Bernard: Good change. We've waited for that change. Manhattan's the smallest community I've ever lived in, and it's fine as a college student, but it's very limited as an adult. Especially an adult who's been used to more cultural activities, much larger and diverse communities.

My wife and I just love people and diverse cultures, and we're really limited here. Also, in a larger city I can leave my work at the office and never see those people that I work with. That's what I'm looking forward to.

Russell: What was your favorite thing to do as student at K-State to relieve stress?

Bernard: The funniest times were streaking. That was hilarious. Someone would announce there were going to be streakers at 7 o'clock between Ford and Haymaker.

I promise you, every resident of Ford and Haymaker was there. Thousands of people looking out their windows or on the ground waiting. Sure enough, some guy with a paper sack would come running. Great fun. Silly and stupid, but great fun.

Russell: I heard you dressed up once and went to Student Senate when it got a little rough.

Bernard: Senate, a lot like it does now, takes itself really serious. They did it in the '60s and '70s, too.

One night, before I got out of office, I decided we were going to have some fun. So, I got two of my black girlfriends to dress up as hookers, and we played the soundtrack to the movie "Shaft." We played that and went into Senate. It was hysterical.

It was a funny night, and we had a great time. In fact, I almost did it here. It was the night Jeff (Peterson) was thinking about vetoing the Lafene bill. But, I didn't know how people would take an administrator coming into a student activity dressed like that. It might be misinterpreted.

Russell: Is there anything we, as concerned students, should know about administrators that don't make the press releases?

Bernard: Like what?

Russell: Mafia relations ... anything like that?

Bernard: I've heard of some, but I don't know how true it is.

Russell: How supportive of squirrels was the University in the 1970s? Were they being hauled off campus like they are today?

Bernard: We fed squirrels. I remember taking bread from the Union to feed them. We were more environmental and more close to nature. We liked squirrels. I don't know what people do with squirrels now.

Row, row, row your boat...

With the wind at their backs and the gentle lapping of the water sounding a rhythm in their ears, K-State rowers competed in the Sunflower State Championships

Saturday, the K-State crew teams were host to their only home regatta of the season on a day when Mother Nature unexpectedly gave them a break.

The weather forecast the night before caused the location of the event to be moved to the Tuttle Creek River Pond.

"We had to make the decision Friday afternoon," men's crew captain Wally Margheim said. "The weather was predicted to have a 10-15 mile an hour wind from the northwest, but it only turned out to be a slight breeze. The weather was a lot better than we expected."

"At 10 o'clock, a little wind came up and we probably could have had the race out on the main lake, but the wind is always worse out there."

As a result, the course was shortened to about 1,300 meters instead of the normal 2,500 meters.

Crew coach Al Koch said the shortened course caused some tight races.

"The shorter course than we're used to racing caused some close and fast races," Koch said. "I've always liked close boat races. It's just a thrill to have somebody right next to you, which makes you try even harder."

K-State ended up finishing third overall in the event, which included Kansas, Wichita State and Washburn.

The only first place K-State recorded on the day came from Rob Bidwell, freshman in chemical engineering, who finished nearly 12 seconds ahead of Dan Steffan from Washburn in the men's open single.

K-State finished second in the women's varsity light four, men's novice eight, and women's novice eight events.

Koch said he was happy with how his team rowed.

"We raced in about the middle of the pack all day long," Koch said. "We hoped to be a little better but we'll build from this."

Margheim said K-State finished about where he thought it would.

"Wichita State is a very, very good team, and KU really came on," Margheim said.

"We did about as good as I expected. Both KU and Wichita State have really good teams. We're still trying to build our program up to where they are now."

Men's novice representative Jim Barnard said his team performed well on the day and was happy with taking second in the novice eight.

"We couldn't have asked for much more," Barnard said.

"Practice was pretty rough this last week. We had a really good race, and we're positive on the rest of the season."

The women's novice eight race saw only a .24 of a second difference between the second and third place teams. Both K-State and Kansas had two boats in the race.

"Our first boat came in second, and our second boat came in less than 3/4 of a second behind KU," women's novice captain Gina Root said.

"We had a bad start, and then we caught up to the second KU boat and got close to them and started slashing oars with them, which slowed us down. We left Washburn in the dust."

Varsity women's crew captain Kim Desch said she was happy all of the day's events and the entire season has been successful so far this spring.

"It was really exciting for us," Desch said. "I was walking around and it was the biggest relief in the world to know that our regatta went good."

"We had really nice weather and we were happy and did the best we could."

"The crowd was pretty big and it helped a lot to have people cheer us on. The audience gives you a rush and makes your adrenaline flow," Desch said.

Desch also said she felt the team has improved.

"We all have improved 100 percent or more since we went to Waco over spring break, and hopefully we'll continue to improve," she said.

Cats won't overlook NU

Trevor Grimm

A glance at its record might indicate that Nebraska is not a baseball force to be reckoned with, but K-State might be catching the Cornhuskers at the wrong time.

The Huskers, 14-18-1 on the season, are in the midst of a four-game winning streak as they head into Manhattan for a two-game series. After defeating Oklahoma 8-2 on Wednesday, Nebraska swept a weekend series against Oral Roberts to pull within four wins of the .500 mark.

As a result, don't expect K-State to take the Huskers lightly Tuesday and Wednesday.

"They're always very competitive," K-State coach Mike Clark said. "It looks like they're swinging the bats real well."

The Cats, meanwhile, continued their up-and-down season by losing two of three games against Missouri last weekend to fall to 19-12 overall, including a 3-5 record in the Big 8.

K-State's Paul Cranford holds onto the ball while the homeplate umpire calls a Missouri runner safe during Saturday's game at Frank Myers Field.

Since opening 9-3, the Cats have played .500 ball, posting a 9-9 record in their last 18 games. A light schedule, which has seen

Hickson leads Cats' rushers

Dan Lewerenz

They say if you want to win, you have to be able to run the ball.

With juniors Eric Hickson and Mike Lawrence returning, that's not going to be a problem for the Wildcats next year.

"We've got two great backs returning this year," Coach Bill Snyder said.

"Mike and Eric both did superb for us last season, and we look for them to do the same next year."

Hickson, an honorable mention selection to the all-Big 8 team last year, compiled 816 yards on 158 carries last year while sharing time with Lawrence.

His 5.2 yards-per-carry average is the best single-season average among the Cats' top rushers.

Hickson also caught 14 passes out of the backfield for 173 yards (12.4 per catch).

"Right now Eric's our No. 1 guy," Snyder said. "That's not to say that Mike or another player won't take that spot. But based on last year's performance, I'd have to say that Eric is going to be our starter."

But Hickson said he doesn't see it that way.

"Mike and I are a team," he said. "Sometimes I'll start and sometimes he will — we really don't care. We want to win the game, and if he gets more yards than me and starts the next game, we'll just try to win that one, too."

Lawrence racked two 100-yard games (against Kansas and Northern Illinois) en route to a 599-yard season.

While Hickson's speed allows him to turn the corner on opponents, Lawrence's strength allows him to break through opposing lines.

Also in the Wildcat backfield is sophomore Marlon Charles, accumulated 143 yards on 30 carries last season.

The only missing piece from last year's backfield is fullback Dederick Kelly. But redshirt freshman Brian Goolsby and junior Matt Gangwish are poised to step into that role.

"Brian's got a lot to learn before he's opening holes like Dederick. But he's great," Hickson said. "Brian and Matt are going to do just fine."

Switzer frustrated with America's Most Wanted

Well, it's that time again. The old mailbox has overloaded with letters. Here's a handful that got my attention. Pay attention to the first two; they were faxed to me during spring break.

(Editor's note: WARNING While reading this column, make sure to make a mental note that Shane's advice has not actually been solicited. Shane was caught making fictitious letters. We'll let him dream.)

Dear Shane,

The *%&#@ really hit the fan here. This whole Michael Irvin situation is going to drive me to my grave. I don't know what to do. Please help me. Any advice is appreciated!

Barry Switzer, coach of the Dallas Cowboys
Irving, Texas

Coach Switzer,

Calm down. No need to worry, you've been through this before with players. Just grab that old OU handbook and turn to the necessary page. Oh, by the way Barry, don't, I repeat, don't release Irvin! No need to get rid of one of the best wide receivers in the game.

Dear Shane,

I've come to an important time in my life. I'm at the crossroads. I can't decide if I should go into the NBA or stay here at Kansas. What do you think?

Jacque Vaughn
Lawrence

Jacque,

Hey, I know how you feel. Coming out of high school, I thought about going to the big show also. But I decided to take my shot at college instead. Jacque, I'm here to tell you that you're ready to go. Your ability to travel and carry the ball is at the level of any NBA player!

Dear

Shane,

I really want to get drafted high in the NFL draft coming up. I'm a little concerned

though on my status on getting to the NFL. Do you think I hurt my chances on getting to the NFL with my incident this past fall?

Lawrence Phillips
Lincoln, Neb.

Lawrence,

Let's see, Michael Irvin was indicted on two counts of drug possession while in a hotel with a couple of "ladies of the night." Last week, Colts linebacker Quentin Coryatt was charged with pointing a handgun at a motorist. A couple of weeks ago, Steelers running back

Myview

SHANE
McCormick

Bam Morris was arrested on two counts of drug possession, strangely enough in Texas also. Last week, ex-Chief Todd McNair was charged with animal cruelty. Lawrence, I'd say you'll fit in nicely to the NFL.

Dear Shane,

We're hoping to gain some exposure to our new exciting league. Could you help us promote our league?

Major League Soccer Headquarters

To whom it concerns,
Pack up now while you can save yourself the embarrassment. A professional soccer league is not going to work in the United States. Nobody is going to watch a team that has the name "The Wiz."

Dear Shane,

We're not too sure about the odds for this weekend's tournament. Can you help us out? Who would you favor to win the Masters?

Las Vegas Odds Committee

Committee,
Forget the obvious choices of Nick Faldo and Fred Couples. Faldo hasn't finished in the Top 12 since he won it in 1990. Couples looked pretty good a couple of weeks ago, but he shouldn't be favored either. This past weekend, Couples' iron play was sporadic, to say the least. Don't forget that he still has some back problems. My bet to win the Masters would have to be Colin Montgomerie. He's looked good in recent big tournaments, including the Dubai and the Players Championship.

Dear Shane,

We have never had a team mascot before. What do you think of our new mascot, Slugger-r-r?

Herk Robinson

General Manager of the Kansas City Royals

Herk,

I love the mascot. I mean, on his first day, as he climbed out of the box, he stumbled and fell. He displays the Royals' season already!

7 Year Bitch appeals to limited audience

Page Getz
staff writer

■ Major label release expresses reoccurring theme of anger.

There is something to be said for a band that can market itself as confrontational whiners accompanied by equally shrill and empowered thrash and punk it off.

One might say 7 Year Bitch has balls — or more accurately — the band has ovaries that mosh.

Released in March on Atlantic Records, "Gato Negro," is the band's first release on a major label.

It follows "Sick 'em" and "Viva Zapata," on CZ records, an independent label shared with the Melvins and Huevos Rancheros.

In the raw tradition of Hole and L7, 7 Year Bitch is mercilessly explicit and unapologetically ill-tempered.

The music growls, purrs and goes into heat, endearingly combining stoned feminist wisecracks and bitter feminist realism.

Vocalist Selene Vigil's sly and vicious voice produces an erotic teething that carries the songs when the music doesn't.

While the record includes some catchy riffs, most of the music borders the redundant and predictable, with nothing innovative or signature that would make them stand apart from the sort of "femme fatale" self-proclaimed "white trash" thrash genre. Unfortunately, the drunken vixen commentaries are hard to take seriously as anything more than drunken vixen commentaries in songs like "24,900 Miles Per Hour" that grindingly and repetitively howl: "I need some chemicals, I'm too emotional, I need some chemicals, I'm too emotional."

Generally, the band's lyrics lack the sober capacity to develop from its bitching something more than bitching which makes them neither unique, nor enlightening.

Instead, it starts to sound like feminist drunks in need of some Midol and an A.A. meeting, as the band's former guitarist, Stefanie Sargent, whose fatal overdose almost buried the band a month before its debut album in 1992.

"Gato Negro" reveals no surprises, but does achieve a status as a record eligible for the CD stash you might save for events such as P.M.S., post-dumped mourning and self-destructively guilt-inspired aerobics.

This limits its appeal to an audience that would appreciate its rage and power, but not read much into the music technically, or lyrically.

Still, despite the success of 7 Year Bitch and its major record deal, the band still comes across with an authentic "Hey, I'm a Kmart shopper that really can't afford this guitar" type sound.

This rugged integrity makes them seem like the kind of sisters you could pick scabs and eat generic cheese puffs with while comparing belching techniques.

Balance defines sound, program of youth choir

Jessica White
staff reporter

The K-State Chorale will join with voices from down under in a vocal concert at 8 tonight in All Faiths Chapel.

The Australian Woden Valley Youth Choir will perform at K-State as part of its American tour.

"I think they're very enjoyable," Rod Walker, professor of music, said. "They're a very unusual choir."

The Australian choir is made up of young people, ages 9 to 19.

The choir was established in 1969 and has since been on several overseas tours including a previous tour to Canada and the United States, Japan, New Zealand and the United Kingdom and Europe.

"They're a well-respected ensemble internationally," Walker said.

The Australian choir has some ties with the K-State choir. In 1989, the K-State choir went on tour in Australia and sang with the Woden Valley Youth Choir, which also provided them with home stays.

Now K-State is returning the favor, the Australian singers will be housed with residents for their stay.

The K-State Chorale will be performing pieces including "The May Night" by Johannes Brahms and "The Devil's Nine Questions," an old English folk song arranged by Lloyd Pfautsch.

The Australian choir's program is to be announced.

"You'll get to hear also a mix of older voices, a more mature choir and then the younger-sounding choir with a different balance," said Anne Walker, senior in vocal performance, "especially since the Woden Valley Choir, they're predominantly female."

"Chorale is a smaller group, and it's a more even mix between male and female," Walker said.

"We're getting to experience a different country's type of singing. It'll be very interesting," Walker said.

"To put the Americans and Australians together on a concert is always fun, to see how they react to each other. It'll be a really neat experience."

► UNIVERSITY OF KANSAS

Broadcast students to learn craft at campus TV station

Associated Press

LAWRENCE — After years of planning, a student-run TV station is scheduled to begin operating at the University of Kansas.

School administrators hope to have Channel 14 up and running by the middle of April.

The station will probably reach only those viewers within a 30-mile radius, but John Katich, an associate professor and head of the journalism school's radio and television division, said the station will be a laboratory where his broadcast students can learn their craft.

"(It's) a place for them to put the theory to the test," Katich said.

The Federal Communications Commission approved a construction permit for the station in 1989. But the university by 1993 still hadn't adopted a plan for paying for the television station, which carried a $125,000 price tag.

The FCC warned the school the permit would expire if the money wasn't found.

"The FCC contacted us and told us that if we didn't move on this, we were going to lose it all," Katich said.

That is when David Shulenburg, the university's vice chancellor for academics, helped locate money to finish the project.

"Shulenburg really took it under his wing," Katich said.

"He made it happen. He could have said that it was too momentous of a task, so I give him the credit."

The station also is a central location for the university's visual communications arm, Katich said.

"We have had little pockets of video capabilities on campus, but not a central platform like this," he said.

If campus radio station KJHK is any indication of the students' interest in broadcast, Katich said, the television station is on its way to success.

Several broadcast classes will work with the television station.

The 15 students enrolled in the Advanced Broadcast Reporting class rotate in filling positions as reporter, producer and photographer.

Anna Ortiz, a Garden City junior enrolled in the class, said the combination of learning about broadcasting and applying what she is learning in the classroom has been valuable.

"The hands-on experience lets you know what to expect when you walk into a real newsroom," Ortiz said. "There aren't as many surprises."

K-State-Salina adds directors

New directors want to advance research, opportunities for students

Tom Roesler
staff reporter

K-State-Salina has recently added two new directors to its staff.

Jack Henry, dean of the college, announced last month that Farhad Tadayon has been appointed as the director of the Technology Assistance Center, and Glen Owen has been appointed as the new coordinator of the Continuing Education Center and Career Services.

"We're really excited about both of those candidates. They're well positioned to produce the results we're projecting for them," Henry said.

The Technical Assistance Center's goal is to help Kansas industries improve through the application of appropriate technology and business practices. Its focus is to research industry's needs.

"We help to enhance their knowledge and their competitive edge," Tadayon said.

Besides just researching new technologies for the industry, the technical center can help with training employees in areas where companies need them to be trained.

"If they need education or training in specific areas, we would be able to provide them with that," Tadayon said.

Tadayon graduated from Wichita State University with a bachelor's degree and a master's degree in mechanical engineering and also earned a master's in industrial management and received a degree in manufacturing and industrial engineering.

Tadayon said he is excited about his new job and looks forward to the things he will be doing.

"This is something I've been looking forward to. To try to coordinate all of those activities is quite interesting," he said.

Owen, as the coordinator of Continuing Education and Career Services, has an important job at K-State-Salina, Henry said.

"One of his most important jobs is to help students get good paying jobs in their fields," he said.

Career Services involves placement of graduates of the college into the technology industry. Also, Owen arranges on-campus interviews, which give the students an opportunity to meet more employers.

In relation to the on-campus interviews, Owen has helped coordinate a Career Fair scheduled for April 22.

"We've invited 250 employers. We hope to have between 40-50 employers on campus to talk to students," Owen said. "It's open to any K-State student who wants to come over."

Continuing Education is the other part of Owen's job. This ranges from non-credit courses on campus to courses for credit at distance locations.

Owen said the program can take students to businesses like Raytheon and Phillips Lighting to teach the students computer skills in the work force.

Owen graduated from K-State in 1971 in political science. He went on to get his master's degree in education at Ball State and completed a fellowship in career services at Indiana State.

Owen said he is happy about his new job and is ready to do his best.

"I'm very excited about K-State. As an alum, I'm very proud to represent the University," Owen said.

Henry said Tadayon and Owen are capable of doing a good job.

"They're great people for the job and we're really looking forward to the benefits of their efforts," he said.

Lecture addresses socialism's roots

Speaker answers questions about Democratic Socialism

Page Gatz
staff writer

Black and white questions shed some light on the gray nature of the issues encompassed within democratic socialism Monday night, when the national youth director of the Democratic Socialists of America, Carmen Mitchell, addressed students and faculty in Forum Hall.

Sponsored by Students for Peace and Justice, the lecture included a brief history of the organization, the roots of socialism and a summary of the misconceptions about the movement.

Mitchell identified four main issues as characteristic of the democratic socialist movement, including non-exclusive public ownership in addition to rather than in place of corporate management, modification of social programs, the responsibility of the individual to contribute to the whole and the economic extension of democracy beyond the political sphere.

DSA is the largest socialist organization in the nation with 14,000 members and a quarterly journal published by the youth section of DSA.

"Much of what we're doing now involves fighting the right-wing agenda's retrogressive changes and providing alternatives, putting theory into action and giving ordinary people a voice," Mitchell said.

The questions were cut and dry, including inquiries about DSA's political stance on Affirmative Action, whether or not democratic socialism is anti-capitalist and what differentiates socialism from communism.

"I was looking for a group that looked at things holistically, not as a competition of oppressions among the oppressed, none of this, 'I'm more oppressed than you,'" Mitchell said.

Raised as one of four welfare-dependent children with a father heavily active in Union leadership, she said she believes this heightened awareness predisposed her to becoming an activist.

"I never would've had a definition for what socialism was, but in my heart, when I look back on it now, I was always a closet socialist," she said.

"I could open the refrigerator or go to a grocery store and see all this food and at the same time see this person outside begging for money."

Despite some apprehension about DSA in its association with communism, Mitchell maintains that DSA is not a militant organization.

"I am a pacifist," she said. "I am not an advocate for violence. Some radical leftists and some radical right believe in bloodshed for the revolution now, but I'm not talking about that kind of activism."

"It may be a revolution, but gradual and continuous work within the system in coalition with other groups will make gradual and continuous change," she said.

The University Lectures in the Humanities series will end with a lecture about self-consciousness in 20th-century art and literature tonight.

John Kronik, professor of romance at Cornell University, will speak at 7:30 p.m. in Union 206.

"He'll put into context the movements of art and literature," Bradley Shaw, department of modern languages, said. "He is, I think, an excellent interpreter of humanities."

Shaw said Kronik will cover the development of literature through the centuries. He will also include a slide presentation in his lecture.

Shaw said self-conscious art and literature are pieces that are aware of themselves.

Anyone interested in the 20th century and the ideas of the 20th century will enjoy the lecture by Kronik, Shaw said.

Kronik specializes in modern literature, mostly of Spain and Spanish America.

Freeman standoff continues

Associated Press

JORDAN, Mont. — Dozens of FBI agents filling this farming community haven't yet worn out their welcome in their standoff with the anti-government Freemen, a minister said Monday.

"These are the most patient people around," said the Rev. Helen Young, whose flock at St. John's Lutheran Church has included some of the people now barricaded inside the Freemen compound.

She said residents are willing to wait for a peaceful conclusion.

"They know about waiting," she said.

"They wait for the seasons to come around. They wait for the seeds they plant to grow. They wait for their animals to give birth. They'll wait."

Media crews and FBI roadblocks could wear down that patience, cautioned Garfield County Attorney Nick Murnion.

"People might start getting a little tired before too long of the kinder, gentler FBI," he said.

FBI spokesman Ron VanVranken in Billings refused to answer any questions Monday about the progress of negotiations.

A woman and her daughter left the compound Friday, and on Saturday two carloads of relatives of the Freemen were allowed to visit.

The standoff began March 25 after federal agents arrested Freemen leaders LeRoy Schweitzer, 57, and Daniel Petersen, 53, on a variety of charges.

Others in the compound also face charges.

The Denver Post on Monday quoted Murnion as saying a key roadblock in talks was the Freemen insistence on their own independent government, and their own grand jury to look at their case.

He refused to elaborate Monday for the Associated Press.

About a dozen Freemen in the compound face state or federal charges, ranging from writing bad checks and impersonating public officials to threatening to kidnap and murder a federal judge.

DEBATE

before saying how to handle it. His vice presidential candidate, Ezekiel McCracken (Colin Rafferty), sophomore in secondary education, recommended kidnapping Faculty Senate member's pets and holding them for ransom.

Hunter Hoss, senior in electrical engineering, asked candidates if they felt it was a double standard to publish evaluations without also making public students' grades in the class.

"Personally, I agree with you. It is a little bit of a double standard," Horsefeathers said.

Hansen agreed the question made a valid point that needs to be included in discussions about the issue.

"However, we're paying their salaries, and they're not paying us to go to school," he said.

LeDoux also said students pay professors' salaries.

"We need a way to evaluate the services that we receive," he said.

Campus security was also an issue raised in the debate.

Hansen said he would propose adding to the 12 cameras, which are used around campus to increase safety.

Horsefeathers said he recommends using a giant man-bat to patrol campus and placing a call signal atop of the K-State Student Union.

Wiedeman said it is the job of administration to ensure the safety of students and to promote a better campus. He said there need to be more security officers on campus to prevent crimes from occurring.

Jill Strasser, junior in accounting, asked Hansen and Otto if they felt that more lights on campus would be better than using security cameras.

"Yes, lighting is an absolute priority," Hansen said.

"Next year $80,000 is going to be spent on it. Some of that money comes from the city/University fund and some from administration," he said.

The last question of the debate, asked by mediator Matt Jones, sophomore in business and issues and ideas chairman for UPC, concerned the reasons behind each ticket's reasons for seeking office.

"I'm doing it to get the ladies,"

Horsefeathers said.

McCracken said he wanted to bring back common sense to student government.

"We are tired of seeing Student Senate run around like a chicken with its head cut off," he said.

McCracken said more students need to get involved.

"We need to get people to vote. Even if what we do pisses some people off so much that they vote against us, at least they vote," he said.

LeDoux said he wants to make sure students have a voice in their government.

"Brent and I have seen a lot of things in student government, which bother us. Students don't have a voice," he said.

"We need to be careful that we don't price students out of an education," LeDoux said.

Hansen said he wants to improve the University.

"Teacher evaluations are a great way to make K-State stronger. Campus security is a great way to make K-State stronger," he said.

Elections for student body president will be today and Wednesday.

BOMBINGS

quoting sources who would not provide any specifics.

A federal official told the Associated Press that investigators defused a live bomb that was found in the cabin, where they also found bomb-making chemicals and components, and notes on making bombs.

The Los Angeles newspaper said that device not only was completed, but had batteries attached.

The newspaper's sources would not say if they had evidence that Kaczynski was preparing to deliver that bomb.

Federal prosecutors from California, New Jersey, Montana, Connecticut, Illinois and Utah met in Washington today to discuss how to proceed with the case, including choosing a coordinator for the investigation.

Kaczynski, 53, was taken into custody at his cabin near Lincoln, Mont., on April 3 and is being held without bail in Helena.

He has been charged in federal court with possession of bomb-making materials.

Peter Duren, a mathematics professor who taught Kaczynski in 1962, said his student was dedicated to his studies, which included theoretical issues of mathematics and an 80-page dissertation on boundary functions.

"He had neat handwriting and an analytical mind," Duren said.

The thoroughness described by Duren is evident in Kaczynski's writings.

In "On a Boundary Property of Continuous Functions," Kaczynski wrote, "One could go on listing such corollaries ad infinitum, but we refrain." In another published essay, "Boundary Functions for Functions Defined in a Disk," Kaczynski noted his favored proof was "shorter and neater," than the alternative.

The Unabomber's Manifesto draws specific correlations between the pressures of new technology and "social disruption and psychological suffering."

Professor Chia-Shun Yih, who served on Kaczynski's dissertation committee, said there is no evidence of this in the mathematical work Kaczynski did at the university.

"There is no connection between the violent bombs and the work he did on his dissertation," Yih said.

Duren said the faculty may not have been aware of the articles Kaczynski published independently during his time at the university. Kaczynski released at least five studies between 1965 and 1969.

Investigators have linked the Unabomber to a bomb targeting university psychology Professor James McConnell in 1985.

Psychology Professor Charles Morris reaffirmed past suspicions reported in the Michigan Daily that the Unabomber might have disagreed with McConnell's book "Understanding Human Behavior" and his genetic experimentation.

are from so many places and know so many people, they are their own best resources in finding people for the activities they have scheduled during the month of April.

"I think people have questions about Native Americans, and basically I think our month is for answering those questions," Blackbird said. "With this month, we can teach the students and the community about what we do and who we are."

Blackbird said in a learning environment like the University, there is the opportunity and chance to learn about various cultures.

"It's a big world out there, and there's a lot of people in a lot of different places who all feel different about where they live and their own culture," Blackbird said.

"I think this month gives us a good concrete basis for learning things about each other so there is an understanding about one another and not so many questions."

their March 20 league opener, might be part of the reason for the up-and-down play.

"We haven't played much," Clark said. "We're going through a three-week stretch when we play the majority of our games."

"We haven't been playing bad, we just haven't been playing real good."

Matt Koeman will start on the mound for the Cats at the game 7 p.m.

Tuesdays, while Pat Driscoll will throw for the Huskers. Koeman has struggled in Big 8 games this season, posting a 7.40 ERA and a 1-2 record in 4 starts.

Overall, Koeman holds a 4.68 ERA and a 4-3 record in 10 starts and one relief performance.

"We need Matt to throw well," Clark said. "We need to get him back to throwing like Matt Koeman can."

The game at 2 p.m. Wednesday will pit K-State's Jon Oiseth against Nebraska's Steve Fish. Oiseth holds a 4.60 ERA and a 5-1 record in 11 games this season. The start will be the sixth this season and the first in conference play for Oiseth.

Offensively, K-State is led by second baseman Scott Poepard, who is hitting .369 on the season and has 39 RBIs. Poepard is coming off a 4-for-5 performance in Sunday's 5-2 win against Missouri. Third baseman Todd Fereday is hitting .367 with 33 RBIs.

After the series in Manhattan, the two teams won't have to wait long to face each other again. K-State travels to Lincoln this weekend for a three-game series against the Huskers.

WELCOME

- Welcome to the Collegian's 1996 Voter's Guide. The Collegian staff compiled this guide by asking candidates about issues, qualifications and goals. Because of space constraints and to allow for fairness, the candidates were asked to keep their responses to a certain amount of words.

In the responses below and throughout this guide, an "*" will note when candidates have exceeded their limit. Candidates are listed in alphabetical order. Questions posed to the candidates are listed below. So, with that in mind, please read the following pages and make your vote count.

QUESTION NO. 1

- What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

QUESTION NO. 2

- What would you do to enhance the quality of student life at K-State?

QUESTION NO. 3

- In 50 words or fewer, describe what makes you more qualified for this position than other candidates.

1. K-State has excellent student services. Its quality must be maintained and should be enhanced. Higher education goes beyond the classroom. Cultural programs, athletics, student health and other supportive services play a vital role in the K-State experience. We will ensure that services are high-quality, cost-effective and meet the needs of students. WE will give K-State students more for their money. A university doesn't just grant degrees — it shapes lives.

2. Students' first priority is the quality of their education. We will work to make teacher evaluations public so students can select the instructor who best meets their needs. Second, a student cannot receive a quality education if campus is unsafe. We will enhance safety by continuing support escorts and installing security cameras to monitor parking lots and vulnerable areas. Most importantly, we will strive for balance between reasonable student fees and quality services.

3. We will use our broad backgrounds and open minds to work for the students. We value and encourage student input, and consensus and comment are the keys to our success. If you have any ideas or questions, e-mail us at (cchan@ksu.ksu.edu) or (aotto@ksu.ksu.edu). Check out our homepage at (<http://www.ksu.edu/~cchan>).

1. For too long, SGA has operated to serve its own needs and not the needs of its constituents, the students. For irrefutable proof, look to the student referendums concerning privatization of the Union and how the students' wishes were roundly ignored. Twice these referendums failed to meet the majority needed for action, yet SGA and Union Governing Board carried on in direct opposition of the will of the students who will bankroll this project.

2. Life at K-State will be improved when the voice of the common student is restored, and common sense is the meter stick by which decisions are made. Healthy and informed students are essential to the well-being of the University; therefore, we will do everything in our power to enhance the quality of Lafene and the Collegian. By staying abreast of the students' concerns, and not only those of Student Senate, life will be considerably improved.

3. Veterans of the Spanish-American war. Helped capture several members of the James gang. Horsefeathers once made a tenderfoot dance with his iron. McCracken? 1. Clearly the most pressing issue at KSU is the level of fees students are being forced to pay. We believe that students pay enough already! Students deserve the right to voice their opinions on how much they pay in fees. We feel that all proposed fee hikes should go before the students for a vote! This is their campus, and they should have a say in the process. Let students, not administrators, make the decisions!

2. First, publish the results of teacher evaluations for the students to use. As student consumers, we should have all available evaluating tools. Second, work to upgrade campus safety by replacing outdated emergency phones, lighting and surveillance cameras. Finally, we would work with the city to ensure that student renters are protected from slum landlords by pushing for a mandatory, city-wide, safety inspection code. All rental homes and apartments should be safe for student renters.

3. When we say something, you can depend on us! When we say that we want student input, we mean it. We voted for a bill that would have allowed students to vote on the student health fee. Actions speak louder than words! We're workhorses, not showhorses. Vote for action, not talk!

QUESTION NO. 1

► What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

QUESTION NO. 2

► How would you describe the communication between senators and their constituents?

STUDENT SENATE — ARTS & SCIENCES

Abbott

Aubrey Abbott, sophomore in political science

1. I believe the biggest issue is the value of our education from K-State. Academic issues pertain to each of us. Academic concerns include publishing teacher evaluations, opposing plus/minus grading system, enhancing the minors program, increasing class sections available, increasing academic honesty and ensuring the quality of GTAs.

2. I believe some senators do an outstanding job of informing their constituents and soliciting input; other senators don't communicate with their constituents at all. When the topics are hot, though, there is more communication in both directions.

Baugh

Hilary Baugh, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine

1. Many important issues affect the students of K-State. However, the one issue that concerns me most is campus safety. Violence in the form of rape and assault are on the rise, and though we have services to protect students, more needs to be done to make the campus safe.

2. Senators have been elected by members of their college to represent their interests in Senate. Senators should always be aware of how their constituents view the issues. Communication should be open and expected by senators of their constituents. Without communication, Senate is not serving its purpose.

Carney

Patrick Carney, senior in political science/ history

1. The financial health of our students and the university services is the most important issue. We have to find ways to improve the services offered to students without pricing them out of an education. Most importantly, we need to get more bang for our student fee buck.

2. Communication between senators and students should be a two-way street. When issues of importance arise, senators should seek input from students directly, through the paper, etc., but students need to vocalize their opinions all the time as well.

Cates

Robin Cates, freshman in social work

1. Student fees. Student Senate needs to make an effort to keep tuition low so that education is affordable for students. I will fight to keep from raising fees and find other ways to keep quality high at Lafene and other campus facilities.

2. Needs improvement. I plan to make myself more available to my constituents. I am open and willing to fight for what my constituents think.

Cooper

Michelle Cooper, senior in English/pre-law

1. Accountability. I believe that, as senators, we should take the issues to the students and actively seek their input. Voting on issues based on personal beliefs is not why we are elected to office. We should always seek the students' feedback and represent them accordingly. We represent students, not ourselves.

2. The communication is less than desirable. Senators should seek input from as many students as possible and not just their circle of friends. As a senator, I will actively seek the input of many students and make myself available to all. I will make sure their questions are answered.

Ecklund

Michelle Ecklund, economics/pest science and management

1. Definitely student fees and tuition, but due to the two-year rotation of student fees and the change to linear tuition, the likelihood of changes will be minimized. I will concentrate on problems that affect students in general; for example, paying tuition by mail and alcohol at football games.

2. As a senator, I have found that students will state their opinions, if asked. It is imperative for senators representing students to ask, not assume decisions based only on their own experiences and prior knowledge. Student opinion is the deciding factor of a vote.

Franquemont

Lach Franquemont, sophomore in physics and philosophy

1. Continuing to provide quality services to students. This year we have seen Student Senate lessen the quality of both our health care center and our student publications. This trend must be reversed.

2. It's unfortunately very limited. I know that some people do take the initiative to contact their senators on important issues, which is great, but I feel like most people have no voice.

Hoestje

Sara Hoestje, sophomore in biology/pre-health

1. Accountability is the most important, all-encompassing issue at K-State. It includes the appropriate use of student fees, senators being responsible for their voting, the quality of education and services by the institutions and honesty by administrators.

2. I think most senators try to vote informed and how they think the constituents would want. However, when seeking advice, they first turn to friends. Sometimes the representation becomes distorted. Also, most constituents find out results of voting and information from the Collegian, not from the senator.

Adams

Doug Adams, freshman in psychology

1. The increasing cost of education at K-State. Some valuable programs are being strangled by reduced budgets. Raising fees is not necessarily the answer; there has to be some compromise. Working together with its constituents, the Senate can work out a solution.

2. It could be better. The Senate has forgotten that it is here to serve the students.

Breeding

Jake Breeding, junior in pre-medicine

1. Student fees are still the most important issues on our campus right now. I will remain dedicated to giving a hard look at each fee to keep the cost to students low, but the level of service high.

2. I think that there is a lot of room for improvement. I will continue to actively solicit student input through contacts, e-mail and student groups. I think that it is imperative to close the communication gap to run a successful Student Senate.

Castelano

Shayne Castelano, junior in biochemistry/pre-medicine

1. WANTS and NEEDS. After seeing the problems with Lafene Health Center and Student Publications, the student body needs to discern between the important and luxuries. As representatives, student senators need to understand the issues and communicate the differences to their constituents.

2. As a whole, I think communication is lacking between senators and their constituents. I also feel that both parties are to blame. Senators are often unable to get a true feel for what their constituents want, because only the most vocal will speak out. And students are generally apathetic.

Cohorst

Scott Cohorst, sophomore in anthropology

1. I think that the most important issue at K-State is that we keep our status as a quality school at an affordable rate. We need to look at what is best for the students today and what will be best for the students in 20 years.

2. Students live busy lives. Most students don't have time to research issues. They just read about them in the paper. It's the senators' job to let students know what is going on beneath the paper. Then find out what the 20,000 students who aren't in student government think.

Donnelly

Travis Donnelly, junior in history

1. The most important issue is keeping tuition and fees low. It is important to have tuition and fees at a low level while providing a stable base for quality student services so all students can afford our educations.

2. Good communication between senators and their constituents should be the most important attribute of a responsible senator. As a participant in many activities ranging from Privilege Fee Committee to rugby, I receive constant feedback from a variety of students on a wide range of issues.

Ediger

Scott Ediger, senior in economics/German

1. The proper allocation of funds is the most important issue facing student government. I will work to bring more student input into the process of setting privilege fees.

2. The role of the student senator is one of service. A senator should seek and understand the opinions of the student body and accurately represent these opinions in Senate.

Halabi

Sam Halabi, freshman in economics/political science

1. The most important issue at K-State is the fair opportunity for all groups, students and interested individuals dedicated to Wildcat improvement. This includes keeping all allocations to student organizations along equal guidelines and keeping fees to a tolerable, if not stable, level.

2. Communication currently lacks enough interaction between students and representatives. The only way to improve the interaction is to inform all concerned. Visitations to all living establishments and notices on the OSAS office would help dramatically.

Hutchins

Jenny Hutchins, freshman in undeclared

1. I feel the most important issue at K-State is the rising cost of attending college. The possibility of higher tuition and increased student fees might make attending K-State less affordable to many students. I feel every student should have the opportunity to attend college.

2. Senators should be responsive to the concerns of their constituents by maintaining an open line of communication. Senators should be accessible to their constituents, and constituents should feel free to discuss any subject with them. Senators should listen to constituent concerns or suggestions and effectively communicate these concerns to others.

QUESTION NO. 1

► What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

QUESTION NO. 2

► How would you describe the communication between senators and their constituents?

STUDENT SENATE — ARTS & SCIENCES — CONTINUED

Johnson

Nicole Johnson, freshman in psychology

1. With rising tuition costs and next year's change to linear tuition, keeping student fees low and education affordable is extremely important. Senate works to keep fees low when it reviews and votes on whether the fees need an increase or not.

2. Communication between Senate and the general student body is poor. Though senators consult students before voting on important issues, they can't reach everyone, and the general student body isn't as informed as senators are. Strengthening the visitation program would increase communication and better inform students about upcoming legislation.

Krafels

Jeff Krafels, junior in criminology

1. Voicing any concerns my constituents may have and keeping fees at a reasonable level with quality service, but making a compromise so we don't have to cut services. Although fees provide the students with many services, I think we need to remember that there are other expenses that are more pertinent.

2. I think there needs to be an open channel. I will make sure that my number and e-mail address are known and made public. Without the constituents' vote, I would not be able to be in my position I was elected to serve. If elected, I'm obligated to listen.

Reese

Mandy Reese, freshman in music education

1. Quality programs and services. K-State has a tradition of offering quality programs at costs affordable to college students. None of us want to see our standards decline. I want to maintain and improve the current standards without making drastic and unreasonable changes.

2. All senators would like to have the time to reach out to their constituents. When this is not possible, students should take the initiative. With the new accessibility to e-mail, it is easier than ever to reach your senators, and I encourage everyone to do so.

Schreiner

T.J. Schreiner, sophomore in medical technology

1. The most important issue on campus is all fees that affect students. Every student is concerned how or when their hard-earned money is being spent. I want to make sure that student money is being spent on what the students want and need.

2. Communication? I don't think there is enough communication between the students and Senate. I'm tired of being left out of my government. I believe students should have a voice in THEIR government. This is why I am running for Senate, so you can have voice in your student government.

Keating

Maggie Keating, sophomore in political science

1. I want to strive for more student involvement in the decision-making process so that students are a part of it and not just the ones who suffer the consequences. Student activism is very important, and I would like to see more of it and less apathy.

2. As senators, it is important to be accountable to students and their needs. This is an issue that Students for Students stands behind. Communication is a function that must be present in order for student government to prosper.

Mann

Tracey Robert Mann, freshman in political science

1. Fees are K-State's most important issue. It is very important to keep student fees as low as possible while maximizing the services that are rendered. We cannot have user fees for Lafene and for the Rec. Too many students simply could not afford these vital services.

2. Communication is poor at best. Students do not know their senators, and many senators do not take the time to ask their constituents about their feelings on issues that directly affect them. This must change in the future. Student Senate will more by better communicating with its constituents.

Rothwell

JoAnna L. Rothwell, sophomore in pre-law and political science

1. Student Senate needs to be accountable to students and work for students. The quality of services offered at K-State and the education we receive should involve research and attention. Student fees need to be carefully regulated, and we should publicize teacher evaluations.

2. Communication between fellow senators, in addition to constituents, could be greatly improved. Electing senators who are open-minded and eager to work for students (like those in my political party, Students for Students) would narrow this gap.

Tomb

Sean Tomb, senior in political science

1. Fees are clearly the most important issue facing K-State, and Student Senate has a large impact on setting fees. We need to keep fees as low as possible so we do not price students out of an affordable education. I am dedicated to keeping fees low.

2. It is important to have a diverse network of people to advise you on student issues. The key to being a good senator is being open to other students' ideas and concerns. Senators need to use constituent concerns on issues and apply them to the way they vote.

STUDENT SENATE — EDUCATION

Barrow

Keri Barrow, junior in secondary education/biology

1. From my experience on Student Senate, student fees are the most important issue for students. I want to continue to evaluate each new fee request and keep each at the lowest level possible, but I also want to find the balance between low tuition and fees as well as good services.

2. I believe the communication between senators and their constituents is low. I hope to question my constituents in my education classes and be more available to all students by phone and e-mail.

LeDoux

Jessica LeDoux, freshman in elementary education

1. I feel that the most important issue at K-State is student fees. I believe students should vote on all fees. It is the person's right to give his or her input on fees that will affect them as students.

2. I believe communication between senators and their constituents could be improved. It is important for senators to approach students on topics being presented in Senate. If elected, I will listen to students' concerns and views before casting my vote.

Rogers

Mark Rogers, sophomore in education

1. Campus safety — we need to put speed bumps on the campus roads. Campus fees are another issue we need to sit down and change.

2. Pretty well, but it could be better. I think maybe it is the way the senators are communicating. Maybe we need to change this.

Colwell

Paul Colwell, senior in secondary education/biology

1. Of course the most popular and controversial issue is student fees. I think through positive, effective and open communication, another important issue between departments and organizations, the whole process would definitely go smoother.

2. Struggling. There are steps that can be taken to improve communication — not only between senators and constituents, but from the top down.

Mulroy

Shanna Mulroy, freshman in elementary education

1. The issue that concerns me the most at K-State is the safety of the campus. There are too many dark areas around the campus for someone to lurk and hide. I believe that to ensure the safety of the people, the walkways that go between buildings and the parking lots

2. I believe that the communication between senators and their constituents is fairly good but could be improved. Senators represent the students; therefore, they need the students' input. If elected as senator, I will make sure to approach students and get their opinion about issues before I vote.

QUESTION NO. 1

► What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

QUESTION NO. 2

► What would you describe the communication between senators and their constituents?

STUDENT SENATE — AGRICULTURE

Brown

Thurman Brown, freshman in animal science and industry

1. The most important issue facing K-State today is the continual raising of student fees. The University continues to mandate fee increases while providing little in the way of additional services. It seems to me that the students here at K-State are in essence receiving no BANG for their BUCK.

2. The communication between senators and their constituents is poor, to say the least, in my opinion. I would like to change this by talking one on one with those I represent and getting their input on the issues that face K-State so that information can be relayed to the administration.

Eckert

Gabe Eckert, freshman in agricultural journalism

1. Maintaining high-quality student services while keeping student fees as low as possible is one of the most important issues facing K-State students today.

2. Communication between students and senators is essential in order for student views to be accurately represented. I believe the communication process needs to be improved so that every student on campus feels comfortable contacting their student senators to express their views.

Glendening

Bret A. Glendening, sophomore in agricultural economics

1. Certain fees should be classified as user fees. Others need full student body support. The fees we pay should be voted on by all students, a majority to increase, decrease or continue the fee. Two-thirds vote of Senate then should set the amount of the increase or decrease.

2. LESS THAN DESIRABLE: There are several senators who say, "My constituents" this, and "My constituents" that. But do these senators know? Maybe, maybe not. I will stay in contact with students and keep them informed and abreast of the issues, and I would encourage my colleagues to do the same.

Hulse

Joshua Hulse, animal sciences and industry

1. I feel the most important issue concerning Student Senate is the allocation of privilege fees. It is important that fees be set at affordable levels and the services provided by the fees are of the highest quality. It is easy to verbalize no fees, but we must have high quality.

2. On the whole, I feel it is lacking. It seems to me that a lot of students are lackadaisical in their interest of student government. Likewise, many senators don't shake the student opinion tree enough. I think the communication lines could be greatly improved on both ends.

Neufeld

Jennafer Neufeld, sophomore in agricultural economics

1. The fees/services ratio. Are students receiving and using the value of the fees they are paying? If the answer is no — either the usage of services could be promoted and increased or fees could be decreased (or vice-versa). The ultimate goal is complete accountability of services.

2. As a constituent, I received information on Senate issues through the Collegian or by verbal updates from senators in club meetings. Communication could be improved through direct college newsletters (i.e., "Ag Pick-Ups" with information on bills that are especially important to the students in the College of Agriculture.)

Carter

Tim Carter, sophomore in agricultural economics

1. The most important issue is additional parking. We need to find a way to add more parking spots.

2. I will talk to my constituents by way of e-mail. We live in the computer age, so we must take advantage of this.

Edwards

Justin Edwards, junior in agribusiness

1. The single-most important issue facing K-State students today is the increase in student fees. While it is inevitable that fees must rise in order to keep up with inflation, benefits received must be considered, and all costs should be accounted for to ensure the best use of students' money. *

2. Communication should be key between senators and the students they represent. The lack of information relay or nonresponsiveness the constituents input can be very frustrating for students interested in their future and the role their representative takes in molding that future.

Hellwig

Ross Hellwig, sophomore in agricultural economics

1. I think the University must continue to work to prepare students for the constantly changing and advancing job market and industry. This can be accomplished by maintaining a skilled, hard-working faculty and obtaining adequate funding to provide students with the necessary resources to obtain a quality education.

2. Challenging. Many students are not particularly interested in Senate decisions until they see the direct effect in their lives. However, good communication is possible if senators keep their constituents informed and ask them how they feel about various issues.

Huseman

Clayton Huseman, freshman in animal science and industry

1. The most important issue facing K-State is the continuous increase in student fees. Student government must be careful when spending students' money to limit the need for fee increases.

2. It is important that senators stay in contact with their constituents in order to properly represent the entire University. There is always room for further communication. Spending time visiting with constituents is vital to keeping government running smoothly and students satisfied; after all, the University is serving them.

STUDENT SENATE — ARCHITECTURE

Fisher

Melissa Fisher, freshman in landscape architecture

1. Keeping our user fees in our tuition is a must. However, these fees should be reasonable amounts and what the overall student body wants. Additionally, when everyone contributes only a small amount to the whole cost, entertainment and recreational activities become affordable ... even to a college student.

2. Communication is a major problem. Senators have the responsibility to serve students. Nonetheless, students have the responsibility to voice their opinions before a final vote is taken on an issue. Next year, Student Senate needs to function as a team, both within its membership and with the students.

QUESTION NO. 1

► What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

QUESTION NO. 2

► How would you describe the communication between senators and their constituents?

STUDENT SENATE — BUSINESS

Diab

Gibran Diab, sophomore in business administration

1. Senate will deal with many issues in the next semester; however, I view the most important as being the response to the change in fee systems. Along with that, I also see the reallocation of the funds as another issue of importance.

2. I see communication between senators and their constituents becoming better. For example, this semester several bills were introduced that made senators want to hear from their constituents. Likewise, these issues made many constituents vocal about their views. Now we must maintain that communication with all issues brought before Senate.

Evins

J. L. Evins, freshman in business and finance

1. I believe that the most important issue to be faced this year is that of the continual increases of student fees. If there are increasing fees, we must also see increasing services provided to the students.

2. I feel that the relationship between senators and their constituents is very poor. In the future, those ties need to become stronger so that the senators can relay the students' feeling to the administration.

Jones

Matt Jones, sophomore in business management

1. The most important issue at K-State is how to provide the highest quality of education to the students.

2. Generally, the constituents approach their senators only when they are upset. There is little communication between senators and students, which is a problem.

Loriaux

Renee Loriaux, junior in marketing

1. Above all, students need to feel safe on their own campus. Our campus is a students home away from home, and they need to feel as safe here as they do at home.

2. Not only should senators be available at all times to listen to concerns brought to them, but they should take the initiative to seek out opinions of the students they represent.

Plumer

Drew Plumer, freshman in business administration

1. The most important issue is the rising costs students face with attending college. The SGA needs to be fiscally conscious and responsible in making sure that each fee benefits a majority of students, and most of all, enhances life as a whole for K-State.

2. Poor. Every student's opinion needs to be addressed before the SGA votes on another fee increase or change in policy. Senators need to try harder to talk to the people they represent and make sure their opinions are voiced. Your senators work for you, not the other way around.

Rasmussen

Todd Rasmussen, junior in finance and accounting

1. In the next year, financial responsibility will be of great importance. Senate will need to concentrate on stretching every dollar in order to pay for the necessities of campus. This can be done by balancing low fees with maintaining the high quality of services on campus.

2. Open communication should exist between senators and their constituents. My party, Students for Students, consists of candidates from all colleges. We will keep each other informed about what students want. Also, the senator should be available to their constituents by phone, e-mail or by any means available.

Eckert

Matt Eckert, freshman in business

1. How money from student fees is distributed.

2. Fluent and direct communication of the ideas expressed by the general public should be maintained at all times.

Hoit

Jennifer Hoit, freshman in business

1. Tuition and how it is used. Students are paying a lot of money for an education, campus services and the opportunity to get involved with various organizations and activities. It is the Senate's responsibility to ensure that the money is being distributed fairly and used efficiently.

2. Lacking. It has to be the responsibility of both the senators and their constituents to keep the lines of communication open. Senators must keep their peers informed of current issues and make themselves available for feedback. Students need to voice their thoughts and concerns to their senators.

Kelley

Chad Kelley, sophomore in business administration

1. Fiscal responsibility. Especially when it concerns fees, we must make certain that students get their money's worth — the main priority being a good education.

2. Probably average, but it's a two-way street. Both parties share a responsibility to each other. I think the most work lies with communication between senators.

Myers

Jim Myers, senior in accounting

1. I think the most important issue confronting K-State is student fees. It's the most important issue at K-State, because if we don't control student fees, then all the other issues are irrelevant. Without students, then there won't be any parking problems, no concern over Lafene and no bicycle permits.

2. The communication between senators and their constituents should be one of continuous dialogue. Too often senators vote on an issue and don't explain their vote to their constituents. One solution to help senators and constituents communicate is to have business senators' office hours at Calvin Hall instead of the Union.

Prier

Tim Prier, sophomore in accounting and finance

1. Increasing the amount of scholarship money available to K-State students.

2. I speak the voice of the students.

Redhair

Cara Redhair, freshman in marketing

1. I think one of the most important issues at K-State is the need for public teacher evaluations. Students deserve the right to know what other students think about instructors or how a class is taught — the style and philosophy.

2. The communications between senators and their constituents needs to improve. Constituents need to be kept more aware of what is happening on campus and how things affect them.

STUDENT SENATE — GRADUATE

Avila

Chris Avila, graduate student in education

1. The financial structure of our campus is the most important issue at K-State. What should the privilege fees be set at? How are they to be determined? What can students do or say that allow for their structure? I have ideas, and I believe they will be acceptable.

2. I believe the communication to be lacking for certain schools on campus. Being involved in student government for several years has given me some expertise in this area. I want to share the quality of opening dialogue among and across undergraduate and graduate students for all if elected.

Rock

Patrick Rock, graduate student in agricultural economics

1. The most important issue at K-State is the fees students pay and how the money is used.

2. Until now, communication between senators and their constituents have been poor. As a senator, I hope to represent a broad range of people and ideas with communication being the foremost goal.

QUESTION NO. 1

► What do you think is the most important issue at K-State?

QUESTION NO. 2

► How would you describe the communication between senators and their constituents?

STUDENT SENATE — ENGINEERING

Dougan

Jeff Dougan, junior in electrical engineering

1. Tuition and fees. It is important to keep fees affordable to the student. Some have a tendency to throw money at a problem to fix it. I don't believe in that. My Senate record proves it.

2. Communication is very important between senators and their constituents. I constantly try to keep my constituents informed and ask for their input. No matter how hard I try, it is impossible to reach everyone. It is disappointing to see an apathy where many students do not care how senators vote.

Getz

Carlton Getz, freshman in architectural engineering

1. There is no "most important" issue; to claim one often means to ignore others. Student Senate should instead confront a multitude of issues: efficiency (that is, not proposing bills without a plan of implementation) common sense spending, controlling costs, working quickly and effectively and trying to increase student involvement.

2. Constituent-senator communications sometimes seem locked in a viscous circle: Senators who speak to generally uninterested or uninformed students tend to talk down to the students, alienating students more with this inadvertent insult to student intelligence. Senators should avoid this phenomenon while trying to increase student interest and activism in SGA.

Miller

Debbie Miller, junior in civil engineering

1. I perceive the most important issue at K-State as being the student body. We are here to get the best education in the best environment possible. Serving as senator would enable me to direct the students' efforts toward that goal.

2. Interpersonal — senators need to be able to relate with all the individuals in their respective colleges. I would be open to the concerns of the students and willing to represent the viewpoints in the Senate.

Schultz

Leslie Schultz, freshman in chemical engineering

1. I believe that student accountability of student fees is important at K-State. However, I believe student accountability in itself is just as important. Teacher evaluations and social services should be a primary focus of Student Senate by making these programs more efficient for student use.

2. An open-door policy exists between senators and their constituents. Student senators are available to inform their constituents on their questions and address any concerns their constituents might have. The problem arises when this policy is inadequate. Ultimately, the constituents are responsible for expressing their concerns to their student senators.

Webster

Chris Webster, sophomore in mechanical engineering

1. By far the most important issue is expenses. Be it residence hall room and board, parking, tuition or any of the other many bills we pay, the prices continue to rise. This is an important issue that needs to be addressed.

2. One month ago I wouldn't have been able to recognize a single one of my engineering senators, had I walked by him/her on the sidewalk. This best describes my feeling about the present communications between senators and students. I don't plan to continue on with this same pattern.

Evans

Ryan T. Evans, sophomore in mechanical engineering

1. I believe that rising fees is a continuing concern to students. Keeping fees low helps every student though a certain amount of money is needed to maintain services. I will strongly urge Senate to cut unnecessary fat.

2. Communication is tough, though not impossible. For example, not everyone will read this paper. How can we reach those students? Senate needs to strive to close the gap that exists between the constituents and their elected officials.

Middleton

Becky Middleton, freshman in mechanical engineering

1. Fees. Fees and allocations are two of Student Senate's largest responsibilities. K-State is one of the few universities in the country that allows students to determine their own fees, and that privilege contributes to Senate's responsibility.

2. Communication between K-State senators and their constituents needs improvement. Most of the students on campus use the Collegian as a source of information, and many of these students don't realize their input is very important to all senators. They also don't realize they themselves have the right to address Senate *

Ross

Jason Ross, senior in computer engineering and mathematics

1. Money. Looking at most of the issues the Collegian has focused on this year, it seems money is the common thread. The renaming of part of Farrell Library, implementation of Title X, allocations for Lafene and Student Publications — all these issues have money as the common factor.

2. Almost nonexistent. In a random survey of students, how many could name a senator from their college? More than one senator from their college? I'd guess about nil. I hope that if I'm elected I'd be visible enough that students in engineering know to whom they should complain.

Verderber

Elizabeth Verderber, freshman in chemical engineering

1. The most important issue facing K-State is maintaining the quality of education that we have.

2. Communication between senators and their constituents should be an open and continual process. It should be ongoing so that the senators have a feel for how their constituents would react to any issue, not just the main issue of the moment.

STUDENT SENATE — HUMAN ECOLOGY

Drake

Christy Drake, junior in hotel/restaurant management

1. The lack of a transportation system. A plan was developed last year to provide safe rides home for people who had been in Aggieville or just didn't want to walk in the dark. We need to reexamine that idea and work to make campus as safe as possible for everyone.

2. Terrible. As a senator, I feel it is incorrect to vote on an issue without first talking to the constituents. Senators are elected to vote on behalf of the students, not on behalf of themselves. To accomplish this, extensive communication is critical.

Wysocki

Brian J. Wysocki, senior in hotel and restaurant management

1. 1.) MONEY, MONEY, MONEY and where it's all going. 2.) Bike riders need more of everything.

2. Well ... If it ain't broke, look harder. There is ALWAYS room for improvement.

Hayhurst

Jill Hayhurst, sophomore in speech pathology

1. Accountability for student fees. Every student on campus pays fees; these fees should educate students to the fullest potential. I believe Student Senate should educate students about fees and how they benefit from them. Furthermore, each social service needs to be accountable to the students.

2. Adequate. I believe that both the senators and their constituents try to communicate with one another. However, sometimes this communication line fails. I would like to see senators make themselves more available by using forums, the Collegian and publicizing their office hours.

QUESTION NO. 2

► What makes you more qualified to represent the Union Governing Board than other candidates?

UNION GOVERNING BOARD — 1 YEAR

Avila

Chris Avila, graduate student in education

1. The Union Governing Board affects students in many ways. It can dictate tobacco and drinking policy in the K-State Student Union. It can dictate the actual management of the Union, though it usually strays from the mismanagement of it. Lastly, the enhancement of the Union will affect all students.

2. I have worked at the Union for three years. I have been a middle-manager for two years and a paid student leader for one year. Consider this when voting. I have the tact, wisdom and gumption to aid change for students through the Union Governing Board.

Drake

Christy Drake, junior in hotel/restaurant management

1. Because Union Governing Board sets all Union policies, students' lives are affected from the time they enter the building. Policies like selling beer in Union Station are a direct result of student input and work. If students feel changes need to be made, Union Governing Board makes that possible.

2. Next year will be my fourth year on Union Programming Council, and I was elected to Union Governing Board last year. I also served as Union Corporation Board president. I am familiar with the Union and the issues involved and can effectively represent the students as an educated representative.

Strevey

Wendy L. Strevey, sophomore in art therapy/secondary education

1. With the coming expansion, the Union Governing Board will be affecting the structural body of the Union. I want to see that the Union keeps serving to the current students during the construction and transition.

2. I have served in student government for two years. I feel this, along with knowledge of the Union, will help me to represent student will on this board.

Carney

Patrick Carney, senior in political science and history

1. The Union should be the first and last place that every student at K-State should want to go. Thus, we have to make sure that what the Union offers through the renovation is what the students want and will come back for food, services or entertainment.

2. With two years of service on the Board, I am well-experienced in the policies the Union, and I have the know-how to make those changes that students will want in their Union. It is that experience that I can offer for another year to the students.

Hodgson

Mike Hodgson, junior in pre-law, English and advertising

1. Union Governing Board affects nearly every person at K-State. It is the policy-making part of the Union, and with the upcoming Union renovation, the need for competent student representatives is becoming more prevalent.

2. I have been on Union Program Council for two years and am currently serving as Eclectic Entertainment Chairperson. I am familiar with nearly every aspect of the Union and can provide new ideas and influence to UGB. I believe that the student input is by far the most important.

Teagarden

Leigh Teagarden, sophomore in nutritional science

1. As the decision-making branch of the K-State Student Union, it is the Union Governing Board's responsibility to make the choices and changes that are necessary to improve this facility so that it meets and exceeds the needs of all K-State University students.

2. Qualities that I feel effective leaders possess are the ability to listen and communicate with others, a desire to contribute to, not control a group, and a willingness to continually develop their leadership skills. I believe that I have these qualities, and for that reason, I am a very qualified candidate.

UNION GOVERNING BOARD — 2 YEAR

Jones

Matt Jones, sophomore in business management

1. The Union's goal is to be the host to the students. Since the Union Governing Board sets policy for the Union, the Union Governing Board has a very real impact on students' lives. There remains many decisions to be made concerning the renovation of the Union.

2. I feel I am best able to represent the students on the UGB. I am involved with the Union Renovation committees and would therefore be prepared to deal with this important project. I am also the chair of the UPC Issue and Ideas Committee and currently serve on UGB.

Kerschen

Ryan Kerschen, sophomore in chemical engineering

1. The Union should be the "center" of the campus. By making the Union economical and enjoyable, it will become a place students want to go. When students want to be in the Union, not only the atmosphere is enhanced but the effectiveness of Union activities is greatly increased.

2. Although my past experience on UGB is important, I feel my dedication to making the Union into what it can be sets me apart. By bringing in the right private services, the opportunities in the Union go up while costs for students go down. This mixture benefits everyone.

BOARD OF STUDENT PUBLICATIONS — 1 YEAR

2. I am running for this office because I want to be more involved. I feel I can add a new perspective and help steer the Board of Student Publications in the right direction. I'm reliable and enthusiastic and can work well with all types of people.

Carney

Patrick Carney, senior in political science and history

1. Because Student Publications Inc. is funded with student dollars, the needs of students should carry a great deal of weight. If the Royal Purple, Collegian and other publications are going to survive and thrive at K-State, they must have the support of students, so their needs are paramount.

2. Because of my extensive experience with many groups on the campus, I have a chance to develop a well-rounded view of what students want from their publications. With this knowledge and new ideas, I believe Student Publications can become a positive experience for students.

Bitter

Jason Bitter, sophomore in finance

1. I believe that the board should be responsive to the desires of the students. However, it must also maintain its commitment and reputation of publication excellence. I think this balance may be achieved by closer interaction between Student Publications and the groups it is responsible to.

2. As a student senator, I have experience working with the fee allocation procedure. I have seen both sides of the process and have a more balanced view of each position. I believe that drawing from my experience in student representation as well as budgeting methods provides unique qualifications.

Baugh

Hilary Baugh, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine

These performances enhance students' lives, broaden their horizons, entertain them and help them to better understand and appreciate the arts.

Hilary Baugh, sophomore in pre-veterinary medicine

1. One of the most important issues at K-State is teacher evaluations results being made public to students. Teacher evaluations, if answered truthfully and completely, are a good indication of a teacher's ability and effectiveness. At this point, the results aren't published, but I'd help in the process.

2. After serving on Council this past year, I've gained valuable experience that would make me an asset to the Council of 1996-97. I'm enthusiastic, involved and responsible. I would represent my college well, be an effective leader and help make Arts & Sciences a better server of its students.

Johnson

Nicole Johnson, freshman in psychology

1. An important issue at K-State is improving communication; many students don't know what's out there and how to access it. Arts and Sciences has the same problem because of its size. 2. I'm very open to suggestions and comments that my constituents may have. Also, I have had a year as treasurer at Hutchinson Community College, and my second year I was student body president at HCC. While at K-State my first year, I was an intern on Student Senate in 1995-96.

2. I have actively represented Arts and Sciences during the past two years. Improving communication with the current council members has been an achievement, as the current secretary. I would continue to improve council if re-elected.

HUMAN ECOLOGY COUNCIL

Clements

Vickie L. Clements, junior in family studies, human services

BSU elects next year's board

■ New president says he will carry out last year's 5-point vision for recruitment, retention

Rhonda A. Lee
staff reporter

Elections for executive board positions for Black Student Union were Tuesday night in the K-State Student Union.

Those elected will take office April 23.

President-elect Gemini Pankey, junior in speech, said he plans to continue to carry out the BSU five-point plan of recruitment and retention of African American students, political awareness, African American faculty/staff interaction, community involvement and financial empowerment.

Pankey said he is looking forward to seeing new members coming out to support BSU. He said he is also looking forward to working with the newly elected executive board members.

"I hope for them to make the most out of their positions, to be creative and to communicate effectively with the rest of the exec board," he said.

Next year, BSU will be dealing with a full schedule of events.

Pankey said he is planning to lead BSU in participation in the Million Family March, which is the next phase of the Million Man March that was last October, as well as an improved Mr. and Ms. BSU Pageant and the second annual awards ball.

Jawwad Abdulhaqq, junior in political science and outgoing president, said he hopes to see BSU build off what the former executive board had started.

"I hope to see a more aggressive and powerful BSU in the areas of economics and recruitment and retention of African American students," he said. "I'd like to see a more stronger and organized structure in those areas."

Abdulhaqq said he believes that as BSU's president of two years he accomplished his goal of building a stronger structure onto which BSU could build.

"I think everyone — members, outside people — could actually see that there is some type of structure. Not everyone may not agree with the structure, but you can see the structure that wasn't there before," he said.

Abdulhaqq said he hopes the incoming executive board continues to bond with one another to avoid problems that the former executive board went through.

"I hope they continue to build off of the openness that the former exec board had, which helped us to formulate certain policies and ideas for the organization," Abdulhaqq said.

"I hope that they stay close and be open with each other. I hope that they take the steps to really bond and get to know each other."

► CITY COMMISSION

City debates funding new armory plan

Chris Oakley
staff writer

City commissioners heard concerns from the public on whether to include funding for a new National Guard armory in its 1996-2002 Capital Improvements Program Tuesday.

In a proposed CIP draft, which is made up of city administration suggestions for expenditures, $500,000 is devoted toward building a new armory.

A new armory is estimated to cost $4.3 million.

Sen. Lana Oleen, R-Manhattan, attended the meeting and urged commissioners to fund the project.

"I'm coming to you not only as a senator who has information from Topeka about this, but also as someone who has worked closely with the Department of Defense," she said.

Oleen promised commissioners she would work for state funding for an armory in Manhattan, although she said she is not certain how much money would be available.

"I'm here to say that at the state level, I will work hard to bring that piece in," she said.

Oleen said the community needs to provide a commitment to the project.

Commissioner Steve Hall said he was concerned the state funds would not be available.

"It's very precarious to plan on something that might be there, but we don't know what or how much," he said.

"I don't see that we have any guarantee from the state."

Oleen said she felt it would be possible to receive state funding.

"If I did not think we had an excellent opportunity, I wouldn't be here," Oleen said.

Hall said although he felt an armory would be beneficial if the city had enough money, he would prefer to take the $500,000 and give it back to taxpayers in the form of property tax relief.

"It's not easy to be against something like this. It's a great project," he said.

Ron Frank, a former National Guard officer, told commissioners an armory would be beneficial to Manhattan.

"It's critical that the community take a look at this sometimes overlooked organization," he said.

"I think in the current climate of military downsizing, Manhattan has an opportunity which doesn't Loving freedom and liking sex should be convincing reasons to oppose censorship.

Nadine Strossen stressed this concept in her speech "Pornography and Free Speech" Tuesday night in Forum Hall.

"I want to focus on the subject of the book I wrote," Strossen said.

"The specific focus is the attack on pornography that has been made recently by a number of feminists arguing that pornography is degrading to women and that it promotes discrimination and violence against women."

In her book "Defending Pornography — Free Speech, Sex and the Fight for Women's Rights" Strossen addresses the misconception surrounding beliefs that feminists view censorship as a necessity in order to preserve women's rights.

The excess media attention received by prominent feminists has led people to believe that all feminists must support censoring pornography, Strossen said.

"The major reason I was delighted to write my book was to put a lie to that misconception," she said.

"I wanted to make it better known that there are a whole lot of women, myself included, who oppose censoring pornography precisely because of our commitment to women's rights, women's safety and women's dignity."

Strossen said she believes pornography has become controversial due to the misunderstanding of the word.

"If you look up pornography in the dictionary, you will see it means nothing more or less than expressions that are intended to be or have

► NATIVE AMERICAN HERITAGE MONTH

Powwow, lectures celebrate culture

Mikki Tice

QUICKread

► K-State's observance of Native American Heritage Month looks at spirituality and heritage through an intertribal social event including dancing and traditional foods.

Special events and guest speakers highlight April as Native American Heritage Month. The month's theme is "Uniting Nations Through Education."

To kick off the week, Harald Prins, professor of cultural anthropology, will speak about "The Condor and the Eagle: Native Rights Issues in the Americas," at 10 a.m. Thursday in Union 208.

Prins said the eagle is the most sacred bird for many native American Indians and represents spiritual powers for their well being.

The condor is viewed by both North and South American Indians for blessings in times of need.

"The talk will be dealing with the difficult times North and South American Indians face with troubles in dispossession of their land, repression of religious practices by the government and racial discrimination," Prins said.

"In their prayers, the Native Americans address themselves to the spiritual powers as represented by the condor and eagle," he said.

This speech is the first of many lectures and activities the Native American Student Body is offering students.

Clyde Henderson, adviser for NASB, said the pow wow will be an exciting event that students can attend to become educated about Native American dances, traditional food and culture.

"The powwow offers a variety of different dances and is considered an intertribal social event," Henderson said.

"One of the dances one will see is the fancy dance. This dance is fast-paced with colorful outfits and feathers. The outfit defines the dance."

Along with the powwow, NASB will be selling Indian tacos which are Indian fry bread topped with lettuce, tomato, onions, salsa, beans and meat.

These tacos will sell for about $3 and can be purchased at the powwow, Henderson said.

Chris Hall, treasurer of NASB, said the powwow should be exciting and Bea Peters, who is a guest speaker, should be outstanding.

"Bea Peters is a wonderful lady who will raise an awareness among students about Native Americans and broaden the University's horizons," he said.

Peters will speak at 10 a.m. April 22 in Union 206 and will lead a women's talking circle from 2 to 5 p.m. in Union 206.

► BOARD NAMES EDITORS, AD MANAGERS FOR STUDENT PUBLICATIONS

Monday evening, the Board of Student Publications Inc. selected new editors and advertising managers for the Collegian and Royal Purple publications.

"The Board of Student Publications had a very important job, and they kept the best interest of the Royal Purple and the Collegian at heart," Ron Johnson, director of Student Publications Inc., said.

The board chose Claudette Riley, junior in English, as editor-in-chief of the Collegian for summer and Kevin Klassen, junior in print journalism, as editor-in-chief of the Collegian for the fall '96 semester. Riley is the arts and entertainment editor for the Collegian, and Klassen is the managing editor.

"With Claudette's leadership in the summer and Kevin's in the fall, I think we look forward to a bright future," Johnson said. "They are both committed to serving K-State readers."

The 1996-97 Royal Purple editor position will be filled by Ashley Schmidt, sophomore in pre-journalism and mass communications, who is assistant editor of the Royal Purple this year.

The board also chose Stacy Foulk, junior in business administration pre-professional, as advertising manager, and Karah Levely, senior in mass communications, as assistant advertising manager for the Board of Student Publications Inc.

Foulk is the sales manager for Student Publications Inc., and Levely is the senior account executive.

► GOVERNMENT LEAKS UNABOMBER INFORMATION TO JOURNALISTS

WASHINGTON (AP) — A week ago, America had never heard of Theodore Kaczynski. Now the country knows all about him: his rickety bicycle, the contents of his cabin, his telltale typewriter, his travels to California, his body odor.

Officially, none of this came to you from your government. Some of it came from acquaintances and yearbooks and the local librarian and professors who knew Kaczynski. But much came from the government unofficially — from "federal law-enforcement officials" and officials "who spoke on condition of anonymity."

People in the government have leaked and leaked again.

"And I think it's criminal," said David Goldberger, an Ohio State University law professor and former legal director of the American Civil Liberties Union in Illinois. "This is a recurring catastrophe in our legal system."

As a spokeswoman for the press, Jane Kirtley, executive director of the Reporters Committee for Freedom of the Press, said she cannot fault journalists for getting information wherever it can be found. But as a lawyer, she said, "I deplore law enforcement complaining about the press printing unsubstantiated rumors on the one hand while handing them out on the other."

She said journalists have a duty to scrutinize information from sources who will not allow themselves to be identified and to make it clear that the suspect has been found guilty of nothing.

► SUSPECT'S CABIN GIVES CLUES

HELENA, Mont. (AP)

— As the investigation into the Unabomber's attacks stretched across the country, the tiny wilderness cabin of suspect Theodore Kaczynski yielded more clues.

A second live bomb that had the same design as one used in a fatal Unabomber attack was found in the isolated cabin near Lincoln, the New York Times reported Tuesday.

But two federal sources told the Associated Press that only one live bomb, along with a partially assembled one agents had described in an arrest warrant, had been found as of Monday night.

The names of some of the Unabomber's victims also were discovered in documents in the cabin, the Washington Post reported today. Quoting unidentified senior law enforcement sources, the Post said the names were not in list form but found in written material that was not described.

► ARMY TO BURY RON BROWN

FORT MYER, Va. (AP)

— The rite begins in darkness. In a red-brick stable, majestic white and black steeds are washed, groomed and trimmed with newly shined brass and buffed hand-tooled leather.

As the sun rises, white-gloved soldiers stand at attention, and a casket holding the remains of one of America's leaders, heroes or veterans is placed atop a horse-led black caisson.

"The only thing that changes is the faces," said Pete Cote, blacksmith for 26 years in the Caisson Platoon, the Army's only horse company that "escorts fallen comrades" at Arlington National Cemetery.

The ritual will be repeated Wednesday when Commerce Secretary Ron Brown, an Army veteran, is buried at Arlington.

Brown was killed in a plane crash last Wednesday while on a trade mission to the former Yugoslavia.

Books not bound by traditions

■ Barbed wire, suitcases give students materials for book projects

Sara Edwards
staff writer

Before Brandon Mock could open his book to show to the rest of his Drawing III class, he had to unlatch the sides and lay them down on the floor.

On the inside, there were not pages like a normal book.

Instead there were bars and sculptures, paintings and a poem. There were actual pages, but they were torn out and pasted to the floor.

Mock, a senior in art therapy, was presenting his midterm book to Charles Stroh's Drawing III class. Many of the books did not appear to be anything like a book in the normal context.

The students in Stroh's class are required to create four books.

Two of the books are sample books, either bound in the traditional or Eastern way.

The midterm and final books can be anything the student designs, with a lot of artwork involved.

Stroh said these projects could be described as books in the sense that a book is like a container that holds secrets, thoughts and ideas.

The only way to reveal the thoughts in the container is to open it.

"You think of the book as sort of a journey. There's a necessary sequence to get through the book," he said.

Students put their feelings, thoughts and experiences into the projects.

The books came in many shapes, sizes and forms. There were some that were bound like traditional books, but many took other forms such as suitcases, picture frames and various boxes.

Beth Duvall, senior in sculpture, used a suitcase as the packaging for her book.

She made paintings to form the pages. She bound the pages with heavy steel and chained it to the suitcase.

She said the book was about her anger last semester. A suitcase is what a child would use to run away, and she wanted to run away from her anger. The steel-weight binding represented her emotions weighing her down.

Kariann Fuqua, freshman in art education and painting, displayed an untouchable-looking box covered with barbed wire, broken glass and razor blades. She said she got her inspiration from a book she read about poor kids in the South Bronx.

She said she visited a Junction City shelter, and she applied what she learned from the children in her book.

She drew faces of normal-looking children that something has happened to. She has the pages set up so that as people flipped through them the order of the pictures would change.

She placed a screen under the pages and under that, trash, such as a hypodermic needle, to complete the effect.

Other books were done in a more traditional style. Darin Carlisle, senior in painting, made his book about wildlife.

He wrote out text by hand that went across the tops of pages. He painted pictures of many forms of wildlife over postage stamps and pasted them down on the paper.

Nancy Harmon, junior in art, created a book about cowboys with sections or chapters. Her cover was bound in leather, and she had various styles of drawings inside. She used pictures that looked as if they had been drawn by a child, as well as colorful scenes she drew.

Although everyone had a different idea of what a book was, one main challenge they faced was trying to get something visual to have order in it like a book.

"There are different ways to unfold in time what's visible in nature," Stroh said.

SCOTT LADD/Collegian

Charles Stroh, professor of art, lifts a book from the suitcase of Beth Duvall, senior in sculpture, during Stroh's Drawing 3 class. Duvall had used the suitcase to house a book of paintings she had created. The book was shackled to the inside of the suitcase.

These candidates should not be elected

It's an easy thing to run in the annual Student Governing Association elections. You turn in your application on time, attend one mandatory meeting and turn in an expense report by a deadline.

But apparently these rules are a bit too much for 37 candidates. They missed meetings and failed to turn in their expenditure reports — some people multiple times.

The fault lies with the candidates, but it also lies with the Student Senate Elections Committee and with Student Senate. The committee drew up the election guidelines and Senate approved them. The guidelines contain no punishment for not following the rules. Candidates still remain on the ballot. True, Senate will have to vote to approve the candidates, but essentially whoever gets the votes will be confirmed into office, regardless of whether they followed the rules.

During the past two years, the list of candidates who are in violation has grown from the previous years. And that is a direct result of guidelines that do not contain consequences.

But it is also a result of candidates who have no respect for the offices they hope to attain.

These people will be relied upon by their constituents to attend committee meetings, Senate meetings and council meetings. Constituents will be expecting their elected representatives to seek out their opinions.

If these candidates are not trustworthy enough to spend an hour at a mandatory meeting and turn in two pieces of paper by a deadline, then how can we trust them to fulfill their elected duties?

The sad truth is, we can't. We need to elect people who have enough respect for the people they represent and the system to follow the rules. Some of the candidates are those the Collegian Editorial Board endorsed. And we are calling for those in violation to have the integrity not to take office.

That is unlikely, so the voters must take a hand.

If you are voting today, please do not vote for the candidates listed on the right. If you voted for these people yesterday, then contact your student senators. Urge them not to confirm the people in violation. Student senators — please keep this list of people with you when you vote to accept the election results. Do not let these people take office.

A lot of candidates are stressing accountability in their campaigns. Accountability must start somewhere, and this is the place to begin.

Freemen, linear tuition and tennis

Random musings ...

■ Sought for writing bad checks, they call themselves Freemen. How ironic.

Holed up outside some jerkwater Montana town, the Freemen claim to represent the ideals this nation was founded on — independence, personal liberty, property rights and the right to bear arms.

In reality, they represent a particularly dangerous brand of paranoia that's becoming more and more popular in America.

Ever since our nation was founded, there have been those who have sought to live apart. Unfortunately, America has a history of mistreating these groups, usually because of fear and misunderstanding.

But this time it's different. This time it is the recluses who have gone nuts.

It all comes down to property, everything they claim to stand for and everything they've thrown aside.

First, that bad check thing.

Keep in mind the Freemen have not been convicted of anything. But their stance is pretty strange.

The Freemen refuse to pay taxes because they believe the money (i.e. property) they earn belongs entirely to them. It is, after all, the fruit of their labor.

But they are willing to forge checks. Hello. Is this not taking someone else's property without just compensation? Is this not a violation of their property rights?

■ We're about to enter the era of linear tuition. You will pay for the credit hours in which you enroll rather than a flat fee.

What this means for Joe and Jill Student is supposedly they get what they pay for. If students choose to skip class, they are not only risking their grade (believe me on this one), they are wasting their money.

But what if an instructor skips class? Most of the faculty I've had the pleasure of interacting with have been prompt and rarely if ever miss a class period.

But there are also instructors who routinely cancel class, sometimes without notice. So I have an idea.

Everybody keep track of the times your classes are canceled, especially the times you arrive to find a note on the door. Add them up. And at the end of the semester, submit a bill to the cashier's office for the class periods you were not instructed.

Graduating seniors should ask for a check, mailed to their permanent address as listed in the University records. Returning students can simply receive credit toward next semester's tuition.

■ I'm kind of glad the United States lost to the Czechs in the Davis Cup.

For those of you who don't follow the tennis world, the Davis Cup is the annual team competition for a world tennis championship. With players like Andre Agassi, Pete Sampras, Jim Courier and Michael Chang, all ranked in the top seven in the world, the United States should dominate.

But unlike other countries, America's top players often skip the Davis Cup for more lucrative events. So MaliVia Washington and Todd Martin went to Prague, only to fall to Petr Korda and Daniel Vacek of the Czech Republic.

Serves us right. Our top players routinely skip the early rounds, only to sweep in for the finals. Now they'll have to renounce their citizenship to do so. If America's tennis greats want the glory of winning the Davis Cup, they better put in the work in the early rounds.

A new way to run elections

Every year I've seen the same thing at this time in the spring semester.

The trees are wrapped in campaign posters, the sidewalks are covered in chalk, and everyone talks about dissolution with student politics. When they attempt to walk into the K-State Student Union, they receive more flyers and stickers than what is handed out at fee payment.

The end result is some candidates are elected; some are not, and what has become a huge inconvenience for some is out of the way for another year.

It might be time to switch the way things are done here at K-State. I think this year we should incorporate some of the ideas presented to us in an indirect manner by individuals involved with student politics.

During last year's elections and this year's term, I've enjoyed watching the way things get done in public office. Maybe if we all try things this way, elections will be more than just trees wrapped in paper and chalked-up sidewalks. The following are ideas inspired by those we elect to lead us, as well as just a few independent creative ideas.

■ Instead of everyone cramming into the Union and a few select areas on campus, we'll allow all the apathetic voters not to show up. We can distribute phone lists to all the people who care about this campus by way of regularly voting, and they can round up the massive number of people who don't vote and bring them into the Union so they may cast their ballot.

Why not? It is what Student Senate had to do one evening. And anyway, why should you have to show up to vote when several candidates didn't show up for an informational, obligatory meeting this year?

■ Rather than having to take all the time of five to 10 minutes to walk into the Union, show them your ID and consciously mark on a piece of paper, we'll appoint a committee to take a random survey. It will be done out of the public eye, and whoever wins will get to be president.

After the president and vice president are in office, they can simply take random surveys to find out what the rest of us think and desire. (I hate to speak for myself anyway.)

■ Candidates should not be given any chance to voice their opinion, or give any campaign promises. Instead, they can stand outside the Union and hand us tasty and refreshing Flavor-Ices. When we're done with our treat, their friends will give us rides home from class. Whoever's snacks taste the best and car ride is the fastest will win the election.

■ Rent out the sumo wrestling costumes from the Sports Illustrated Campus Fest and decide who will win by gladiatorial combat.

■ Just like the Old Spice "High Endurance Challenge," we'll let candidate greases up with their favorite anti-perspirant (in either scent of "mountain air" or "fresh rain") and grill them on a number of issues.

Whoever sweats the least wins the election and gets a year supply of his or her favorite pit stick.

Any more, it is hard to look at the electoral and campaigning process without a sense of humor. Being able to laugh at the process is important. However, some of the issues that came up this year weren't anything to laugh at, such as the athletic fee and Lafene Health Center's budget. Student government has a say in our lives. The representatives are elected by us, the student body. Make your vote count.

ENGLISH SHOULDN'T BE OFFICIAL LANGUAGE OF U.S.

Editor,

I am writing to voice my disagreement with William Thomas Burdette's column "English should be official language" written in the April 4 Collegian. English should not be adopted as the "official language" of the United States of America.

Although Mr. Burdette's arguments are rational on the surface, they expose his lack of knowledge about the subject.

His first point is a practical argument that everyone should know English to be able to function in society. This is obviously true. But is legislative action necessary? Why are the English as a Second Language courses, wherever they're given, overflowing? Why are new arrivals to this country waiting in line to learn English? Because they know the English language is vital to economic and social success in the United States. Legislative action on this issue, unless it is the allocation of funds to pay for more instructors or instructional material, is frivolous and a waste of the taxpayers' (even those who do not speak English) money.

Burdette exposes a common "American" (read U.S. nationalistic) assumption. Rather than U.S. society adapting to the international norm of learning more than one language, he advocates forcing everyone in the United States to learn only one language — which is the status quo already. The United States is the only country in the world in which you can potentially graduate from the public education system without ever studying another language.

Rather than narrowing our minds, we should be broadening our experiences. If the real issue is communication, then we should all be making an effort to learn each other's languages rather than only speaking one language. Recent immigrants to this country know this, and that is why they are so eager to learn English. Many advocates of the English-only movement are not so eager to learn another language.

I would like to point out there is an inherent attack of the English-only movement on ethnicity and country of origin. Keep in mind that not all of the movement's advocates are as liberal or open-minded as Burdette. The next logical step in many of their minds is to ban the speaking of any language besides English in the workplace.

If you do not agree move to Florida or California where court cases are pending for people who have been unjustly terminated for speaking Spanish or other languages at work. Even in Manhattan, I have been ridiculed for speaking Spanish with my wife and friends. I've been called a "foreigner" even though I was born in Kansas City, Kan.

The last point I have to make is Burdette erroneously uses the term "American" to refer to residents of the United States. This is a common manifestation of the U.S.-centric mind set. "American" refers to all peoples residing in the Western Hemisphere, also known as the Americas. If there is a debate about which language is the "American" language a stronger case can be made for Spanish than for English.

I ask readers to really think about these issues before voicing an opinion on the subject. Please urge the legislators of our state and our country to quit wasting their time on a moot issue and begin tackling real concerns such as poverty, economic opportunity, world peace and international trade.

Judge delays trial

Associated Press

ST. FRANCIS — The sentencing of a former doctor convicted of killing one elderly patient and trying to kill another was delayed Tuesday so a judge could study defense motions.

Lawyers for Stan Naramore argued in Cheyenne County District Court that he deserved a new trial because of juror misconduct in his trial, which ended with his conviction Jan. 26.

Details of the alleged juror misconduct were not immediately available.

The defense also renewed a motion asking the judge to enter a judgment of acquittal, according to the court clerk's office.

District Judge Jack Burr continued the sentencing to April 25.

Naramore faces 10 years to life in prison for second-degree murder in the death of Chris Willt, 81, of Cheyenne County, and for attempted first-degree murder in the death of Ruth Leach, 78, of Bird City.

Prosecutors said both were given overdoses of paralyzing drugs while Naramore was treating them in 1992 at Cheyenne County Hospital in far northwest Kansas.

Willt died at the hospital after emergency treatment for a diabetic problem. Leach had terminal cancer and died three days after being taken to a different hospital.

Prosecutors alleged Naramore injected Willt with a drug that made it impossible for him to breathe on his own and then ordered an artificial breathing device to be stopped.

In Leach's case, they claimed Naramore had twice injected the woman with painkillers, causing her to nearly stop breathing, and was about to administer a third when her son stopped him.

Prosecution witnesses said they believed Naramore had been trying to "euthanize" both patients.

Defense witnesses had questioned the autopsy results and said both patients died of their own illnesses.

Naramore was charged in July 1994. He was arrested that month in Lovell, Wyo., where he had worked at North Big Horn Hospital for six months.

He surrendered his Kansas medical license in May 1995.

Professor explores self-conscious art form

■ Cornell University professor says art distorts, beautifies reality

Rick Druse
staff reporter

The idea of self-conscious art and literature — art that is created about art and literature that writes about literature — is usually considered a 20th-century idea.

John Kronik, professor of romance studies at Cornell University, said the concept of self-conscious art and literature can be dated back to the 16th century. He gave the last lecture Tuesday night for the University Lectures in the Humanities series.

"What we see as a feature of our time has been with us for some time," Kronik said. "Art beautifies reality, and art distorts reality."

What he said he means is that the artists of self-conscious art give beauty to what they see and do not represent the true perception of reality. It goes beyond the limits of the normal rules followed by many artists.

"Self-conscious art has always been the counter-movement, the one that goes against the grain," Kronik said.

Kronik said most of the self-conscious art is playful and allows the viewers to have fun interpreting their work.

"Self-conscious can enter realms. It does not have to be playful," Kronik said.

Many paintings that depicted political themes are considered to be self-conscious. He said self-conscious art becomes a defense in a world of chaos, and the artists become like God by painting a perception of reality that they want people to see.

Kronik said architecture, advertising and many other fields have taken the idea of repeating images throughout their works.

"Self-conscious literature is literature about literature that is aware of itself and makes the reader aware of the literature," Kronik said.

He said self-conscious literature pulls readers and allows them to become involved with the work and take a critical stand. He said intellectual involvement is increased by self-conscious literature.

"Self-conscious in art and in life is a path to knowledge," Kronik said.

Business author to speak

Stephanie Schmutz
staff reporter

A nationally syndicated columnist with United Feature Syndicate will be speaking from 10 a.m. to noon Thursday in Union Forum Hall.

Harvey Mackay, chairman and CEO of the Minneapolis-based Mackay Envelope Corp., will be the final speaker for the 1995-96 academic year as part of the Distinguished Lecture Series sponsored by the College of Business.

Mackay has been dubbed "Mr. Make-Things-Happen" by Fortune magazine.

"Mr. Mackay is a friend of President Wefald and agreed to come and speak as part of our lecture series," Susan Thomas, assistant to the dean, said.

"He hasn't given us a topic for Thursday's lecture," she said.

The College of Business will be canceling classes during the lecture to encourage student attendance.

"The lectures are usually directed toward business students," Thomas said. "We have advertised all over campus for the Mackay lecture, and we do encourage all students to come."

Mackay is the author of three New York Times best sellers: "Swim With the Sharks Without Being Eaten Alive," "Beware the Naked Man Who Offers You His Shirt" and "Sharkproof."

He will be giving away 600 copies of his latest book to those attending the lecture.

Mackay is a graduate of the University of Minnesota and went on to receive his master's degree from the Stanford University Graduate School of Business Executive Program.

■ April 10, 1982 — Under icy conditions, the Cleveland Indians opened the season at Municipal Stadium with an 8-3 loss to the Texas Rangers. Five hundred tons of snow had to be removed from the field, and the game was played in 38-degree temperatures with a wind-chill factor of 17 degrees. Despite the cold, 62,443 fans turned out.

Cats lose in 9th

After holding on for 8 innings, the baseball team had the win stripped out of its grasp

► COLUMN

Imagine for a moment this scenario. Your team is ahead 2-1, and you are the closing pitcher. The game has been close all night, but you are confident you can shut the door on your opponent. And then it all comes apart — seam by seam. No, I'm not talking about your hemline, nor am I talking about the seams on the baseball. I'm talking about the game.

Well, that's exactly what happened Tuesday night at Frank Myers Field to Wildcat closer David Johnson.

Let me put it plain and simple. It was a bunch of horseshit.

With one out and a runner on third, Johnson was called in to replace relief pitcher Brian Thompson.

"Country," as his teammates call him, is K-State's ace closer. Used for only an inning at the most, Johnson is brought in to throw the heat. In fact, he leads the team in saves with three.

With one out, it was almost a guaranteed save for the junior pitcher after a fairly dull game where between both teams only three runs had been scored on 12 hits.

But the Cats had hung on as if their season depended on it. They were stubborn. They hadn't played spectacularly, and they most definitely did not play as well as they are capable of playing. But they were not about to give Nebraska the game.

Myview

SHANA Newell

Hendricks was going to snatch the victory from the Cats and hand it on a silver platter to the Cornhicks.

You don't believe me?

Ask Coach Mike Clark and pitching coach Mike Hensley. They missed the last two outs of the game because of a bum call by Hendricks. (Pay attention, now. It's the first-base umpire Hendricks, not the K-State first baseman David Hendrix.)

What happened? Hendricks was seeing some other baseball game — a game I apparently was not seeing.

With Nebraska pinch runner Gene Jenkins on third base, Johnson struck out Josh Dalton, but Dalton reached first on a passed ball by Cats catcher Paul Cranford. Jenkins crossed the plate to score the tying run.

I'll admit, that was K-State's error. But they were still in the ball game. I don't think Hendricks liked that idea.

Matt Meyer fled out to Adam Green in center field. Two outs were on the board and only one to go. Mel Motley singled, advancing Dalton to third. So there Johnson stood, with two outs and runners at the corners.

And here's where it starts smelling like manure. (I have other, more vulgar words I would prefer to be using here, but I will contain myself for those readers who have sensitive eyes.)

Johnson balked on a throw to third.

OK, no, he didn't, but that's what Hendricks called. A stupid, idiotic, empty-headed, absurd, asinine, moronic, feeble-minded, imbecilic, ridiculous, rattle-brained, doltish, foolish, foolhardy, irrational, senseless, nutty, crazy call. (I went through my thesaurus to find every word that means stupid. I don't think that I have found quite enough, but you get the picture.)

Within seconds of the call, Clark was in the face of Hendricks while Hensley was being held back by the third-base umpire.

For those of you unfamiliar with Clark, rarely does he get in the face of an umpire. He will argue, and he will disagree, but he usually walks away from a direct confrontation. For Clark to persist in the fight and to argue so vehemently was a sure sign that the fans weren't the only ones who saw the bogus call.

Seconds later Clark was ejected, and eventually so was Hensley.

Johnson threw to third, all right, but for a left-hander, he had a 45-degree radius in which to plant his foot. And according to comments made by Hensley on the field, Johnson planted his foot in the same spot lefties (including Nebraska pitcher Pat Driscoll) had been placing their feet during the entire contest.

The balk brought Dalton across the plate, pushing the Huskers ahead, 3-2. Another passed ball by Cranford advanced Motley to third.

And as if it wasn't nasty already, it became as ugly as seeing Tammy Faye Bakker with or without her make-up on. Husker first baseman Todd Sears homered to center field, driving in two more runs for Nebraska.

Mickey Blount came in to relieve Johnson and struck out Jason Fry to end the inning.

Although the final four batters made a valiant effort, wasn't enough to overcome the theft.

K-State was robbed of a win. Hendricks was guilty of the theft.

Although there's no way to get the win back, K-State can retaliate with four games remaining against the Huskers this week, including a home game at 2 p.m. today.

So get on out to Frank Myers Field and help cheer the Cats to a very deserving victory.

And while you're there, boo, heckle and jeer at Hendricks. He deserves everything he gets.

► GAME COVERAGE

Nebraska 5 K-State 2

Chris May
contributing writer

For baseball fans who left early in the K-State vs. Nebraska game Tuesday night at Frank Myers Field, start kicking yourself now. Wild pitches, a balk and some ejections were on tap for the ninth inning as the Cornhuskers defeated K-State, 5-2.

The game was slow for the first eight innings, as the Cats were ahead 2-1 going into the top of the ninth inning. Then things got interesting.

Nebraska's second baseman, Corey Miller, started off the ninth inning with a single base hit. On a wild pitch from Cat pitcher Brian Thompson, Miller advanced to second base. Husker centerfielder Francis Collins grounded out to the shortstop, which advanced Miller to third base.

David Johnson then took over the duties for Thompson on the mound. Johnson struck out Husker shortstop Josh Dalton, but catcher Paul Cranford dropped the third strike, and the runners all advanced, scoring Miller. The game was tied.

With a runner on first, Matt Meyer stepped up to the plate and hit a fly ball to the center fielder.

With two outs, Mel Motley, right fielder for the Huskers, got a base hit and advanced the runner from first to third. Johnson was called for a balk, advancing all the runners, scoring one and creating an upheaval in the K-State dugout.

Coach Mike Clark ran out of the dugout, followed by pitching coach Mike Hensley. Both were ejected from the game for arguing in the umpires' faces.

The game was tied 2-2, and K-State was out two coaches.

"I can't comment," Clark said of the call.

It was the first time in his coaching career Clark has been ejected from a baseball game.

After the balk and ejections, the Cats lost the lead for good. Motley advanced to third base, and first baseman Todd Sears brought him in with a two-run home run.

Huskers led, 5-2.

The Cats couldn't come back in the bottom of the ninth, as they only got one hit from the designated hitter, Mike Gardner.

It wasn't all bad for the Cats. Starting pitcher Matt Koeman came back from a loss against Missouri over the weekend to pitch a good game, Clark said.

"He threw a tremendous game," Clark said.

"He gave us an opportunity to win, and that's what we needed."

Koeman is no stranger to praise. Last year he was named all-Big 8, and he said that honor has helped him this year.

There's no excuses. Our catching has been way below average all season long, and we've got to start blocking pitches like that. That's what is killing us.

"I tried to stay confident," Koeman said. "I tried to put myself back to last year and tried to get the same mindset that was so successful last year."

One thing Clark was upset about was the catching by Paul Cranford.

Cranford had two wild pitches and two passed balls throughout the game. One of those passed balls scored a runner in the ninth.

"We have got to block that pitch in the dirt. There's no excuses," Clark said.

"Our catching has been way below average all season long, and we've got to start blocking pitches like that. That's what is killing us."

The Cats are hoping to improve as they are host to the Huskers again at 2 p.m. today before heading to Lincoln this weekend. Clark said he wasn't looking ahead to this weekend. Instead, he was concentrating on today's match-up.

"I'm only worried about tomorrow," Clark said.

K-State will send left-hander Jon Oiseth to the mound, while Nebraska sends right-hander Steve Fish. Oiseth is 5-1 on the season with a 4.45 ERA. Fish is 4-3 with a 5.61 ERA.

With the loss K-State falls to 3-6 in conference play and 19-13 overall. Nebraska improves to 4-8 in the league and 15-18-1 overall. K-State has now lost eight games in which it has had a lead going into the seventh inning.

► TENNIS

Cats, Hawks take to courts for Sunflower Shootout

Shane McCormick
contributing writer

The K-State women's tennis team will try to continue its successful spring campaign Wednesday as it travels to Lawrence to face state rival Kansas.

K-State will head into the contest with a five-match winning streak. With the sweep over Nebraska and Iowa State this past weekend, the Cats improved their record to 8-4. The Cats are 2-0 in the Big 8. The Jayhawks will enter the contest as the 18th-ranked team in the nation, according to the latest ITA rankings.

Coach Steve Bietau said he looks forward to playing good opponents.

"We always like to play against high-quality opponents," he said.

"And with the rivalry between the schools, it will add a little bit more to the match."

The Cats should head into the contest in good shape health-wise. Sophomore Lena Pilipchak played in only one singles match this past weekend, after sitting the week out with a viral problem. She will be 100 percent for the match Wednesday. Sophomore Dinah Watson has recovered fully from a shoulder problem she's been fighting all semester.

One worry for the Cats will be the excellent depth of the Jayhawks.

"They are incredibly deep," Bietau said. "Their top player, Hunt, is probably the best in the country. They also have three or four more players that are tremendously strong."

Senior Karina Kuregian and sophomore Yana Dorodnova will try to continue their successful play at the top two spots in singles. Dorodnova is 10-2 on the year.

Kuregian moved to a perfect 9-0 on the season with a couple of dominating victories against Nebraska and Iowa State. Kuregian lost a total of just four games against Nebraska and Iowa State.

If Wednesday's match is tight coming down the stretch, Bietau said he is confident about his teams chances of pulling out a win.

"We've talked about who we would like to have on the court for a deciding match," he said.

"Earlier, our choices were limited. But right now, we have a lot more positions we feel comfortable with playing the deciding match."

Hendrix earns Player of the Week

K-State's designated hitter Dave Hendrix has been named the Mizuno National Player of the Week and the Big 8 Player of the Week for his performances against Wichita State and Missouri.

Against the Shockers, Hendrix tied a single game Big 8 record with three home runs. Since last Tuesday's games against Wichita State, Hendrix is 11 of 25 with three solo home runs, six runs scored and seven RBI.

The senior headed into Tuesday's action against Nebraska hitting .314 for the year with eight doubles, seven home runs and 27 runs knocked in.

► MARTIN, SMITH WIN AWARDS

K-State's strength and conditioning coach Rod Cole announced the football program's Lifter of the Year and Paul Coffman Award winners for 1995-1996.

Sophomore guard Jeremy Martin has been named K-State's Lifter of the Year for his "tireless work ethic and outstanding accomplishments in the strength and conditioning program," Cole said. Martin, who started six games as a red-shirt freshman last fall, bench pressed 383 pounds, hang cleaned 359 pounds and safe squatted 800 pounds in the recently completed testing period.

Meanwhile, senior free safety Mario Smith was honored with the Paul Coffman Award, which is given annually to the player who best exemplifies the work ethic that took former standout Paul Coffman from a walk-on collegian to an all-pro career with the Green Bay Packers. Smith, who was named the Defensive MVP of the Holiday Bowl last year, was the Wildcats' second-leading tackler in 1995 with 95 tackles.

► NEW STRENGTH COACH HIRED

The K-State Department of Intercollegiate Athletics announced the hiring of Sean Sheppard as assistant strength and conditioning coach.

Sheppard comes to K-State from San Diego State University, where he spent the last 5-1/2 years as the Aztecs' strength and conditioning coach. Sheppard is a certified strength and conditioning specialist and is a member of the National Strength and Conditioning Association.

Sheppard, who has also worked as an assistant strength and conditioning coordinator at the U.S. Olympic Training Center, participated in football and track during his undergraduate career at Georgetown University. He received his bachelor's degree in psychology from Georgetown in 1990 and earned his master's degree in physical education and sports psychology from San Diego State in 1994.

Sheppard replaces Scott Reeves, who was recently hired as the head strength and conditioning coach at Rice University.

► FROM ENDZONES TO HOOPS

Several seniors from the 1995 K-State football team will play in a benefit basketball game Friday at Centralia High School.

The players will be available to sign autographs beginning at 6 p.m. at Centralia High School. The game is scheduled to begin at 7 p.m. Players expected to attend are Matt Miller, Mitch Running, Tyson Schwiager, Dederick Kelly, Brian Lojka, Chris Oltmanns and Matt McEwen.

Georgia overturns affirmative action

■ College admissions can no longer base decisions on ethnicity

Associated Press

ATLANTA — In the wake of recent federal court rulings limiting affirmative action, Georgia's attorney general has directed the state university system to abandon admission policies that give preference to minorities.

In an unsolicited letter Monday to University System Chancellor Stephen Portch, Attorney General Michael Bowers said each state college and university should eliminate policies that use separate standards for minorities.

"The message is if you use race to determine who is admitted to Georgia institutes of higher learning, you need to revise them," Bowers said Tuesday.

University system officials were unsure how many of the state's 34 colleges and universities use race in deciding among applicants.

There are 206,000 students in the system.

Portch said in a statement that one of the missions of the university system is to make public colleges as accessible as possible to minorities.

"We are committed to providing a level playing field ... aimed at ensuring that all Georgia students can come to our colleges and universities with an equal opportunity to succeed," he said.

Bowers, a Republican who has been mentioned as a possible gubernatorial candidate in 1998, said he was prompted to write the letter by court rulings declaring affirmative action unconstitutional.

The most recent came on March 18, when a federal appeals court struck down the University of Texas Law School's affirmative-action admissions plan, saying it discriminates against non-minority applicants.

In that ruling, the 5th Circuit U.S. Court of Appeals said affirmative action plans are justified only in very narrow circumstances as a remedy for past discrimination.

Bowers also cited a Supreme Court ruling last June that imposed significant limits on affirmative action. The court ruled 5-4 in a Colorado case that the federal government is bound by strict standards in offering special help to minorities seeking remedies against discrimination.

Although the court did not address education, the new standard was not limited only to programs involving contract set-asides or hiring quotas.

The court appeared to be abandoning aspects of its last two important affirmative-action holdings, both of which were victories for civil-rights advocates.

Last year, at the urging of California Gov. Pete Wilson, the University of California Board of Regents voted to dismantle affirmative-action admissions policies. The change will take effect in the spring of 1998.

Nearly a year ago, a court ruled against a scholarship program for black students at the University of Maryland at College Park.

Air force officer to speak about women in military

Jill Story
staff reporter

The roles of women in the military and in society are changing.

Brigadier General Karen Rankin will speak on that issue at 7 p.m. Thursday in room Derby 134.

"Anybody who is interested is invited to attend," said Captain Susan Hill, assistant professor of aerospace studies.

Rankin is a 29-year veteran who entered the Air Force through officer training school at Lackland Air Force Base in San Antonio.

She has directed technical training at the Air Education and Training Command, headquartered at Randolph Air Force Base in San Antonio since November 1995.

Rankin's job allows her to create command policy and manage the training of more than 170,000 graduates in more than 245 specialties.

Air Education and Training Command sends Rankin out to various universities to speak to ROTC groups about her experiences, said Kathy Reinhart, Rankin's secretary.

While in Manhattan, Rankin will also attend a Manhattan Rotary Club luncheon, speak to Air Force and Army ROTC cadets and observe cadet exercises.

Muslims in Manhattan

Religions

Collegian writer experiences Islam in Manhattan firsthand

They are a minority here in Manhattan, but they are part of the fastest-growing religion in the world.

The name they choose to identify themselves means "one who submits to the will of God."

They are Muslims, and the religion they practice is Islam.

Maybe you didn't notice the humble masjed that was built amid the power lines, strip malls and condominiums of Claflin Road. It doesn't draw much attention to itself, and, save for the crescent moon on a miniature minaret, it's difficult to distinguish the rather Western-looking brick building as a unique cultural landmark.

For Muslims in Manhattan, a group that is comprised mostly of people who are thousands of miles from their homelands, this building serves as place of worship, congregation and fellowship. The Islamic Center of Manhattan provides a sense of community and a special place to pray that makes living so much easier for the Muslims who attend.

For them, it's a spiritual and cultural lifeline to Allah. Christian beliefs, ethics, practices and behaviors dominate American culture from one border to another.

Islam does not have the benefit of being the dominant religion and source of morality in America, and consequently most Americans are ignorant about the religion. And ignorance too often breeds prejudice, lies, misinformation, hatred, animosity, misconceptions, enmity and more ignorance.

To counter my own ignorance, I sought to discover Islam for myself. This is some of what I, a non-Muslim like most of you, have learned.

The best way to learn what Islam is about is to forget what you think you know about it and learn it from the ultimate authority on Islam, the Quran (sometimes spelled Koran).

Islam's origins trace back to the biblical figures of Abraham and his son Ishmael, who are believed to have built a stone sanctuary for worship, known as the Kaba in what is now Mecca, Saudi Arabia. Muslims also believe in the creation story of Adam and Eve, Noah's flood and even the birth and miracles of Jesus.

But most importantly, Muslims believe that from 610 to 633 A.D. the angel Gabriel dictated the text of the Quran directly from Allah to an Arab living in present-day Saudi Arabia known now as the prophet Muhammad. An illiterate man, he repeated it from memory to all who would hear him and eventually developed a following of believers.

The Quran states it is the final and complete word of Allah, surpassing all the divine prophecies and messages taught by previous biblical prophets and messengers like Abraham, Moses, Isaac and Jesus. Muslims believe that the prophet Muhammad is the last prophet and messenger that Allah will ever send to the world. Together, these beliefs form the shahadah.

The Quran itself says it must be written in the Arabic language, but English translations are available. Copies of the Quran are available for free or at cost, because the Quran forbids its own sale for a profit. It is said to be precious beyond price. All prayers in Islam are done in Arabic.

In the Islamic view, all humans belong to one race, and Allah reigns supreme over everyone. The Quran teaches that racial characteristics were created by Allah so people could easily recognize each other, not hate and fight.

Because Allah is completely supreme in Islam, there is nothing that Allah does not know, hear or see, and there is nothing Allah cannot do. The Muslim believes Allah is aware of everything done and left undone. Therefore, the Muslim is constantly aware of Allah's presence.

A day in the life...

At the Islamic Center of Manhattan, the salah is said five times a day without fail.

Muslims (and everyone else who enters) remove their shoes at the door of the masjed. They descend into the building's basement and go to a bathing area to perform a ritual cleansing of their feet and hands to prepare themselves to pray.

As they do this, Khalid al-Sharideh, doctoral candidate in sociology and the masjed's imam, sings the same call to prayer that imams have intoned for centuries. But rather than calling from atop a minaret above the masjed as his predecessors did, he does it over the masjed's intercom system.

Sharideh was chosen by the congregation to be the masjed's imam because he knows the entire contend that these people, in the same way Christians have, are misusing scripture to justify deeds which go against scriptural teachings.

"Most people think we're terrorists, but we're really not," said Syed Shakir, graduate student in electrical engineering and a Pakistani citizen. "That's the media's portrayal of it."

"That's not real Islam," Shakir said.

Shakir is right. Like most Christians, Muslims are just normal people who love God and humankind, wishing to live in peace. And like most Christians, some of them are good people, and some of them are not so good.

Shakir has found that American Christians tend to be more curious about his religious beliefs than non-Christians. He also said that his encounters with Americans have been positive.

"I never had a problem with hostility from anyone," Shakir said.

Muslims tend to be labeled Jew-haters. Shakir said he agrees that political climates in Arabic countries tend to fan the flames of anti-Semitism, but he believes the lack of Jews living in those countries prevents Arabs from learning to understand Jews.

"I was more inclined to hate Jews before I came to America," he said. "I didn't hear the Jewish side of things, because there aren't many living in Pakistan."

"Now I think the hate is mostly because of politics, not religion," he said.

Manhattan can learn from its Muslim community.

America is caught in a deeply divisive debate about values.

"Should we return to the values of the past, or should we define a new morality?" we are asking ourselves and each other.

Muslims have little to debate about values among themselves compared to the West. The moral codes of the Bible are subject to drastically different interpretations and practices, and there is no legal mandate to make us follow the Bible's or any other scripture's teachings. The Quran and the hadith are usually very direct, incontrovertible and indisputable. Muslims have their disagreements among themselves about morality, but they are generally not as vast as the schisms among the respective Christian churches.

The distinction between Islam and government has always been an issue of debate among Muslims. Most predominantly Muslim countries enforce the laws of the Quran in public life.

But when Muslims come to a non-Muslim country like the United States, they cannot expect to rely on the government and society to support and enforce the laws and teaching of the Quran. Westerners, for example, tolerate many behaviors that in Muslim countries would be jailable offenses. Muslims face many challenges to their beliefs and temptations in countries like ours.

In the absence of state-supported religion, Muslims have to rely on Allah and fellow Muslims for support in maintaining their faith.

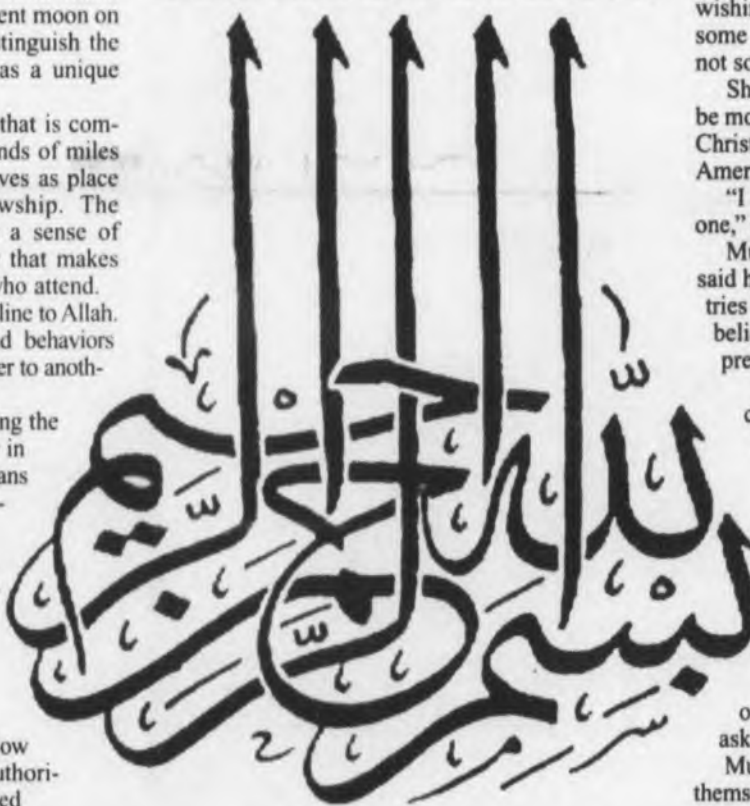

Ironically, the temptations, isolation and adversity of being a Muslim in our distinctly non-Muslim culture has actually strengthened Shakir's faith.

"You go through hard times, and it makes you strong," he said.

The tenacity and faith shown by people like Shakir are exemplary. While so many Christians in America find their faith and morality challenged and put into doubt by those popular trends, changing cultural values, technological advances and issues that occasionally question the Judeo-Christian status quo, Muslims are holding fast to their faith right here in Manhattan, whose culture is as alien to them as the cultures of Amman, Jordan or Medina, Saudi Arabia, would be to most of us.

There's an opportunity to learn from Manhattan's Muslim community coming up soon. The masjed will hold an open house from 10 a.m. to 3 p.m. April 20. Everyone, regardless of their religion or knowledge about Islam, is welcome to attend, Khan said.

"It will be open to everybody, especially non-Muslims, because we want to explain to the community what Islam is about," he said.

This Arabic calligraphy means in the name of Allah, Most Gracious, Most Merciful. These are the first words of the Quran and a common invocation of Allah's blessing upon any discussion about Islam.

Quran by heart and because he has studied the Quran in his native Saudi Arabia.

The men meet and stand in the main room of the masjed to pray. Women stand in a separate room behind the men, in accordance with Islamic law, so that the men will not be distracted by their beauty while praying. Sharideh stands with his back to the people and recites prayers and Quran verses.

During each rakat, the faithful pray standing, bowing, kneeling and prostrate with their hands and noses on the masjed's carpet. The rakat is repeated two, three or four times, depending on the time of day.

"These are compulsory prayers," said Majed Khan, graduate student in electrical engineering. "There are no 'ifs,' 'ands' or 'buts.'"

The prophet Muhammad stated that on Judgment Day the first question Allah will ask of each person is whether or not he or she said the salah five times a day.

Khan takes this admonition to heart. If he oversleeps and misses fajr, he says the salah as soon as he awakes. If he is busy during prayer times and cannot come to the masjed, he tries to find a place where he can say the salah in solitude.

Muslims are people, too.

Most Muslims will be the first to admit they are imperfect people trying to practice a perfect religion. Just as there are in any religion, there are people in Islam who disregard the teachings of their religion or who use their religion to justify political, social or economic agendas. Modern Christians are incredibly uncomfortable with being blamed for the sins of immoral medieval popes or the Massachusetts Pilgrims, who practiced the genocide of Native Americans during King Philip's War. And American Christians feel no affinity for Christian in-fighting in Northern Ireland and the Balkan Peninsula.

By the same token, most Muslims condemn the acts of violence committed by other Muslims. They

INDECISION '96

You probably haven't voted in this year's student elections, nor will you. But that's OK. This campus' student government system is modeled on the U.S. democratic system, which means most people don't vote. Not voting doesn't mean you're a bad person — just normal.

I sure would like to have seen candidates develop more innovative approaches to solving problems on this campus. Here are some I would suggest (prospective campus politicians, take notes):

1. Make the Union a vegetarian-free zone. The way to keep money coming in to Union Dining Services is to keep people buying expensive foods with meat in them. Too many people are buying cheap bread, vegetable matter, fruit, nachos and cheese pizza. In the name of improving the Union's economic health, all food sold in the Union should be required to contain a certain percentage of that profitable seared animal flesh.

2. The fatulence strategy.

Student senators take themselves so seriously they sometimes don't get much accomplished. When Student Senate meetings get bogged down with weighty matters, senators should begin polluting the air with home-made methane. The smell will prompt other senators to get down to business.

3. Union Programming Council A-Go Go. After fiscal disaster of last fall's Soul Asylum concert, it might be a while before K-State brings in a concert featuring artists above the popularity of Quiet Riot and Foghat. With that in mind, Union Station could become a go-go palace featuring UPC members of all genders. They could strip, perform lap dances, and have bachelor and bachelorette parties to raise money. In a few years, UPC could recoup the Soul Asylum show losses.

A BOB DOLE BY ANY OTHER NAME...

Journalists in Tehran, Iran are in a pickle. They're trying to report on the contenders for in America's upcoming presidential elections, but they have a real problem. The words "Bob Dole" sound like the Persian word for a private part of the male anatomy. The Muslim-fundamentalists in control of the country's media do not want to offend their readers with such a word, but they have little choice.

If Sen. Dole's name is any indicator, "Bill Clinton" must mean "lying sack of camel manure" in Persian.

Attorneys claim FBI faked bombing evidence

McVeigh

Oklahoma City bombing suspect's trial unearths accusatory memos

Associated Press

DENVER—Prosecutors agreed today to turn over letters from an FBI agent who tested suspect Timothy McVeigh's clothes and claims investigators faked evidence in the Oklahoma City bombing case.

At the first Denver hearing since U.S. District Judge Richard Matsch moved the case from Oklahoma, special U.S. attorney Beth Wilkinson said she would turn over the memos from Agent Frederic Whitehurst in 30 days. Defense attorneys then can decide if they want their own tests, she said.

Earlier, an attorney for co-defendant

Terry Nichols said evidence provided by prosecutors was yielding material that will help the defense, but processing it was excruciatingly time-consuming.

Michael Tigar told the judge it takes eight hours to review 125 statements by potential witnesses, and prosecutors have flooded defense lawyers with 21,000 statements and 5,000 pieces of physical evidence.

Nonetheless, he said, the statements have been useful.

"There is a great deal of exculpatory evidence there," Tigar said.

The hearing was scheduled to hear requests by McVeigh's attorneys for classified information he says the government gathered on the Ku Klux Klan and neo-Nazis in Europe. Also sought were purported statements from witnesses whose description of the suspects did not match McVeigh. A list of 176 requested items was submitted Monday.

McVeigh and Nichols were charged with federal murder and conspiracy counts and could face the death penalty if convicted of the bomb blast last April 19 that killed 168 people and injured more than 500 others. No trial date has been scheduled, but it is expected to begin late this year or early in 1997.

Wilkinson said Whitehurst had been discredited in other trials, and Justice Department officials want time to review his allegations. She said Whitehurst "found no results" during his testing, but she did not elaborate.

Stephen Jones, McVeigh's attorney, objected to the allegations against Whitehurst, who raised questions about the FBI's role in many investigations, including the O.J. Simpson case.

"I object to counsel's attempt to assassinate Dr. Whitehurst before we even get any of his material," Jones said. "I don't know whether he's right or wrong (about other allegations), I want to know if he's right here."

Wilkinson also acknowledged defense assertions that "inert explosives" were being stored in the Alfred P. Murrah Federal Building when a bomb went off April 19.

She said the explosives were being used as training devices by the Bureau of Alcohol, Tobacco and Firearms, and they were not armed at the time. Among those attending today's hearing was Roy Sells, whose wife, Leora Lee, was killed.

He said he came to Denver "to make sure in my heart that these are the ones that did it. I feel like I'm a hostage caught in a web with nowhere to go."

Sells, a 62-year-old retired federal worker, said if the defendants are found guilty, "I could pull the trigger or pull the switch or insert the injection," because his wife of 37 years was "the closest thing to an angel that will ever be."

Nichols' brother, James Nichols, and his father, Robert Nichols, also attended the hearing.

Matsch moved the trial here earlier this year, ruling an impartial jury could not be seated in Oklahoma.

No trial date has been set, but it is expected to begin later this year or early next year.

McVeigh and Nichols were whisked into the federal courthouse just after 5:30 a.m. today under tight security.

Later, about a dozen people lined up outside hoping for seats in the courtroom. "A lot of people at my office think I'm crazy for even coming down here," Lori Walker, 22, said.

"They're like, 'What if they set off another bomb?' A lot of people think they're guilty, and a lot of people are worried."

come often," Frank said.

Mayor Edith Stunkel said whatever action was taken by commissioners could determine the fate of a new armory.

"I think it's clear that what we do will set some sort of momentum or halt to this project," she said.

Stunkel said she would be interested in finding out whether the building at the airport could be renovated.

She also said funds could perhaps be provided from the Manhattan Economic Development Fund.

Commissioner Bruce Snead said the economic value of a new armory was overestimated.

Snead said he would prefer to spend less than the proposed $500,000.

"It is part of the community responsibility to support the armory. However, the overall need for funds is not something we could meet fully," he said.

"The value of the facility is important, but I think it has been overstated," he said.

Commissioner Sydney Carlin said she was willing to spend the money toward a new armory.

"I continue to support the funding in the current proposal of $250,000 in 1997 and $250,000 in 1998. I think we have to be a little more willing to fight for the federal jobs that we have," she said.

The commission will have a public hearing concerning any item to be included in the CIP vote April 16. It will vote on approval of the entire CIP, including funding for a new armory at its May 7 meeting.

City Manager Gary Greer suggested to commissioners that they put off making any decisions concerning the CIP.

"I don't think you want to make any decision until after the April 16 public hearing," he said.

the effect of being sexually exciting, sexually arousing or sexually provocative," she said.

"The reason people continue to see pornography as a controversial issue is because we do not use the term pornography in the dictionary sense. Rather, we use it to refer to whatever it is we hate in the realm of the sexual."

Strossen's interest in defending pornography and free speech developed early in her life.

"I have always defended free speech as far back as I can remember, when everybody was censoring my speech at home and in school," she said.

"I defend the right of every individual, male or female, to make his or her own decisions about what to see and what not to see in the realm of sex."

Although most students attended the speech to fulfill class requirements, Shanta Bailey, senior in psychology, said she was glad she heard Strossen.

"I came because my teacher suggested it would be a good speech to listen to, but I'm glad I came," she said.

"I thought she was very informative, and she brought up a perspective that a lot of people are closed to," Bailey said.

"Strossen stressed that you don't eliminate the problem by getting rid of it completely, but you eliminate it by counteracting against it with positive images."

Epidemic claims lives of Florida manatees

ST. PETERSBURG, Fla. (AP) — Manatees have lived in Florida's waters for 45 million years, but a mysterious epidemic that is killing the gentle sea cows in record numbers has scientists racing against time.

Wielding filet knives, marine biologists have been slicing through carcasses looking for the cause of the pneumonia they believe is killing many of the whiskered, barnacle-covered beasts so quickly.

The federal Centers for Disease Control in Atlanta has joined the effort.

We do not use the term pornography in the dictionary sense. Rather, we use it to refer to whatever it is we hate in the realm of the sexual.

Students vote with friends, issues in mind

Chris Oakley
staff writer

Voters cited student fees, security and even friendship as reasons for voting in this year's student elections.

"To be perfectly honest with you, I voted for (presidential candidate Chris) Hansen just because I know him," one student, who wished to remain anonymous, said.

"I'm sure other people did the same," the student said.

Student fees were foremost in some voters' minds.

Dave Graham, sophomore in park resources management, said fees and the proposed privatization of the K-State Student Union were his main concerns.

Toby Rush, junior in mechanical engineering, said he voted for Hansen and vice presidential candidate Aaron Otto, junior in political science and general management.

"Some of my main concerns were having candidates who will work well with students and who have a well-organized plan and also the means to reflect student opinion," he said.

Aimee Leslie, freshman in wildlife biology, said no issue in particular was important to her.

"I don't know. I didn't really pay that much attention," she said.

Leslie said she voted for Hiram H. Horsefeathers, (Joshua Baze, candidate for president and junior in advertising) and Ezekiel McCracken (Colin Rafferty, candidate for vice president and sophomore in secondary education), because of the type of campaign they ran.

"They're lighter about everything. They're not so serious," she said.

Amie Myers, sophomore in engineering, said she voted for Hansen and Otto.

"I think I like their security issue," she said.

CARY CONOVER/Collegian

After hearing the election results, student body president-elect Chris Hansen, junior in nuclear engineering, hugs his girlfriend, Alice Williams, sophomore in modern languages and international studies, as student body vice president-elect Aaron Otto, junior in political science and general management, celebrates with Liz Ring, senior in history, Wednesday night at 12th Street Pub.

When the call came, the party at 12th Street Pub had been in full-swing for an hour. It was a little after 10 p.m.

The bartender who answered the phone could barely be heard over the racket in the crowded establishment.

"This is it," he held out the phone to student body presidential hopeful Chris Hansen, junior in nuclear engineering.

Hansen waited for his running partner Aaron Otto, junior in political science and general management, to make his way around the bar before he spoke into the receiver.

"OK. This is Chris," he said.

They stood with their heads bent over the receiver as the crowd fell silent.

"I couldn't hear anything. Just Chris saying 'thank you.' I kept increasing my grip on his shoulder," Otto said later.

There was a second of silence before

▶ Hansen, Otto, 57 percent▶ LeDoux, Wiedeman, 29 percent▶ Horsefeathers, McCracken, 12 percent

Hansen threw his hands in the air and screamed, "Yes!"

The crowd erupted into cheers as the president and vice president-elect jumped up and down and hugged each other.

Hansen then climbed onto a table, narrowly avoiding a collision with a ceiling fan to say his thank yous.

"Everyone, thanks so much. It's really been months, but I feel like it has been 10 years since this all started," Hansen said.

"Just to let you know. We got 1,389 votes, LeDoux got 696, and Hiram got 281."

This statement elicited another uproar.

"It's really uncommon to have such a majority and not have to have a run-off election," said Todd Stover, senior in public relations. "This just goes to show that Otto and Hansen are the best candidates for the job."

Otto distributed cigars to the crowd, still smiling widely.

"I think we really hit a chord with the students and tackled the right issues," Otto said, a stogie in one hand and a glass of champagne in the other.

Chinese community protests coverage

Kara Rogers
staff reporter

Frustration about media reports concerning the recent China and Taiwan conflict led the members of the Chinese community at K-State to exercise one of the basic freedoms outlined in the U.S. constitution — freedom of speech.

In response to letters printed in the Collegian from Chii-Dong Lin, professor of physics on sabbatical in Taiwan, and U.S. media reports about China launching "test" missiles into the sea near Taiwan's ports during elections, members of the Chinese community wrote a letter to the editor endorsed by 118 people in protest of the recent coverage.

Lin, a Taiwanese American, assessed the situation between the conflicting governments in his letters. He supported democratic progress in Taiwan and described the month-long election process.

Hongfei Jiang, vice president of Chinese Students and Scholars Association, said people in the Chinese community are very upset with the media's coverage about Taiwan.

"They ask us why our voice cannot come to the medium. Only one person's opinion was covered for two days in the Collegian," Jiang said.

Wei Xu, president of CSSA, said it is necessary to provide the media with other viewpoints because other people share the same opinions as CSSA.

Yiping Qiu, assistant professor in textiles and interior design, said the U.S. media are biased. China cannot get fair coverage from the U.S. media because of its communist label.

"No matter what China is doing, it is wrong. Only bad news comes from there," he said.

"No good news comes here. No news is good news for China. That is the situation. Do you think that everything that happens in China is bad and that everything that Chinese do is wrong?" Qiu said.

He said the bias of not only the media but the American people stems from a lack of knowledge concerning the history of China and Taiwan.

"I should say that not many people know where Taiwan is or the history of China or Taiwan. Just like if you go to a small Chinese village, and you ask how the American Civil War happened and nobody knows. It is understandable, but that doesn't mean that we shouldn't say something to educate people," Qiu said.

Understanding the history of the two countries allows people to understand what the root of the conflict is.

The conflict is not about who the next president in Taiwan will be or how the president was elected, but whether Taiwan has the right to separate from mainland China.

"It is not because Chinese people have a strong feeling because they are electing someone. It is because a group of people in Taiwan or small group of politicians want in time to separate Taiwan from China. That is the issue that we are concerned with.

"We are not really concerned if Lee Teng-Hui is elected. People in the province should have the right to elect their own political leader, but they do not have a right to declare independence because this is a territory issue. This territory belongs to the people in the whole country, not the people who happen to live there," Qiu said.

He relates this issue of territory to the anti-government Freeman stand-off in Montana.

"They so happen to live there. They don't own that land in terms of sovereignty. They own that land in terms of they can use it, but they do not have sovereignty," Qiu said.

"They cannot declare independence. You cannot say, 'Great, this group of people should have their democratic rights,' but if you surround this group with FBI, then you are against democracy. That is not the issue," Qiu said.

Xu cited an anti-separatist demonstration of 100,000 people a couple of days before the presidential election in Taipei as an example that not everyone in Taiwan is in favor of separating from the mainland.

"We have this passion toward our nation.

People want to stick together because they are our sisters and brothers. So people in Taiwan are all our sisters and brothers. Why should we be against each other? There is no reason," Qiu said.

Prior to the election, China launched M-9 missiles into the sea around Taiwan, but Jiang said this is a regular practice.

"The military exercise is regular. It is normal," he said.

One could relate it to the Taiwan issue, but that was not the Chinese government's intent, he said.

"Chinese will not use military force to solve the problem unless the few separatists in Taiwan really want to separate from mainland," Jiang said.

"Most of the Chinese would not like to see the situation where we would have to use military forces to solve the issue," Jiang said.

"On both sides, people would like to see this problem solved peacefully. So we hope to see that we can unify the whole country peacefully. War is damaging and not good for either side," Jiang said.

The recent events between the United States and China raise the question of whether or not this is the beginning of another Cold War. "I think it is a Cold War mentality. It is not a Cold War yet," Qiu said.

BUSINESS SENATOR CANDIDATE VIOLATES ELECTION REGULATIONS

Gibran Diab, candidate for business senator, appeared before the Elections Committee last night after a rival candidate filed a grievance against him.

Chad Kelley, candidate for business senator, filed the grievance stating that Diab had violated one clause in the 1996-97 election regulations that restricts chalk writing to paved roads and sidewalks only.

The committee decided that Diab had committed a violation after Diab admitted he and two individuals had written the campaign slogans that appeared on the east side of Cardwell Hall and the front of Waters Hall.

Diab said he understands the reasons why he violated the regulations.

"I went by and checked it out, and it was pretty blatant," Diab said. Kelley said he noticed the markings Monday but did not file a grievance until Wednesday.

"We were all warned not to violate the rules. I made certain not to violate any rules," Kelley said.

Chad Schneider, Election Committee chair, said although nothing like this occurred in last year's election, there have been similar violations in the past. These have included chalk markings too close to the residence halls and posters on trash cans.

Diab was not elected.

SPEAKER TO DISCUSS SPACE LIFE

In the 1950s, science fiction movies introduced the inconceivable idea of humans living in space stations, working, while orbiting the earth.

Now it is more than an idea; it is about to become reality.

Questions about the opportunities aboard the Space Station will be answered through an interactive video-conference, "Space Station: The Next Logical Step" today from noon to 2 p.m. in Union 206.

Scientists will discuss their opportunities and other information, Mary-Rita Spooner, NSCORT educational outreach coordinator, said.

"It will be set up with a phone so participants can call in with questions and interact with the panelists," Spooner said.

The PBS video conference will feature astronauts from recent shuttle missions and scientists involved in space research offering insight into the potential breakthroughs in drug design, materials processing and the life sciences.

It will also feature segments from NASA research facilities around the country.

"It really helps students to understand a basis of importance in kinds of space research still in development. Any student interested in innovation and exploration would benefit," Spooner said.

Other universities across the nation will also participate in the video conference, Spooner said.

The event is sponsored by the Division of Biology's NSCORT Gravitational Biology Center.

"Not only are scientists involved but undergraduate as well as graduate students. We also go into junior high and grade schools to expose them to the excitement of gravitational space science," Spooner said.

For the past five years, K-State has done gravitational experiments, as well as send experiments on shuttle missions. K-State hopes to continue with the new international space station, Spooner said.

Friends console losing party

Tom Roesler
staff reporter

With the outcome hanging in the balance, presidential candidates Trent LeDoux and Brent Wiedeman talked, laughed and smoked cigars with their supporters at Tubby's.

Before the call from the Election Committee, LeDoux, senior in animal science, and Wiedeman, senior in agricultural education, tried to stay relaxed.

"I'm pretty anxious right now. I predict it's gonna be pretty close," Wiedeman said.

LeDoux said he felt confident about their effort and said the outcome rested in the voters' hands.

"I feel good about the campaign. The students knew I was shooting straight with them. It's up to them to decide now," LeDoux said.

LeDoux said he didn't want to promise anything he couldn't uphold.

"If people are going to vote for us, they will. If they're not, they're not. I'm not going to push myself on them," he said.

Throughout the night, friends and supporters came through the door and pulled up bar stools around the two candidates and shared drinks and stories. The crowd never showed any signs of nervousness or pressure. Confidence was the only thing to be found.

"We want to take it all tonight," Marty Reichenberger, co-campaign chairman, said.

Expecting the call to come in before 9:30 p.m., LeDoux lit up a cigar to pass the time.

"I've only got one cigar, so they better call fast," LeDoux said.

At 10:05 p.m., the call finally came in.

LeDoux and Wiedeman went to the back of the bar to the phone.

With friends gathered around to hear the word, LeDoux broke it to them plan and simple.

"It's over guys. It's over," he said.

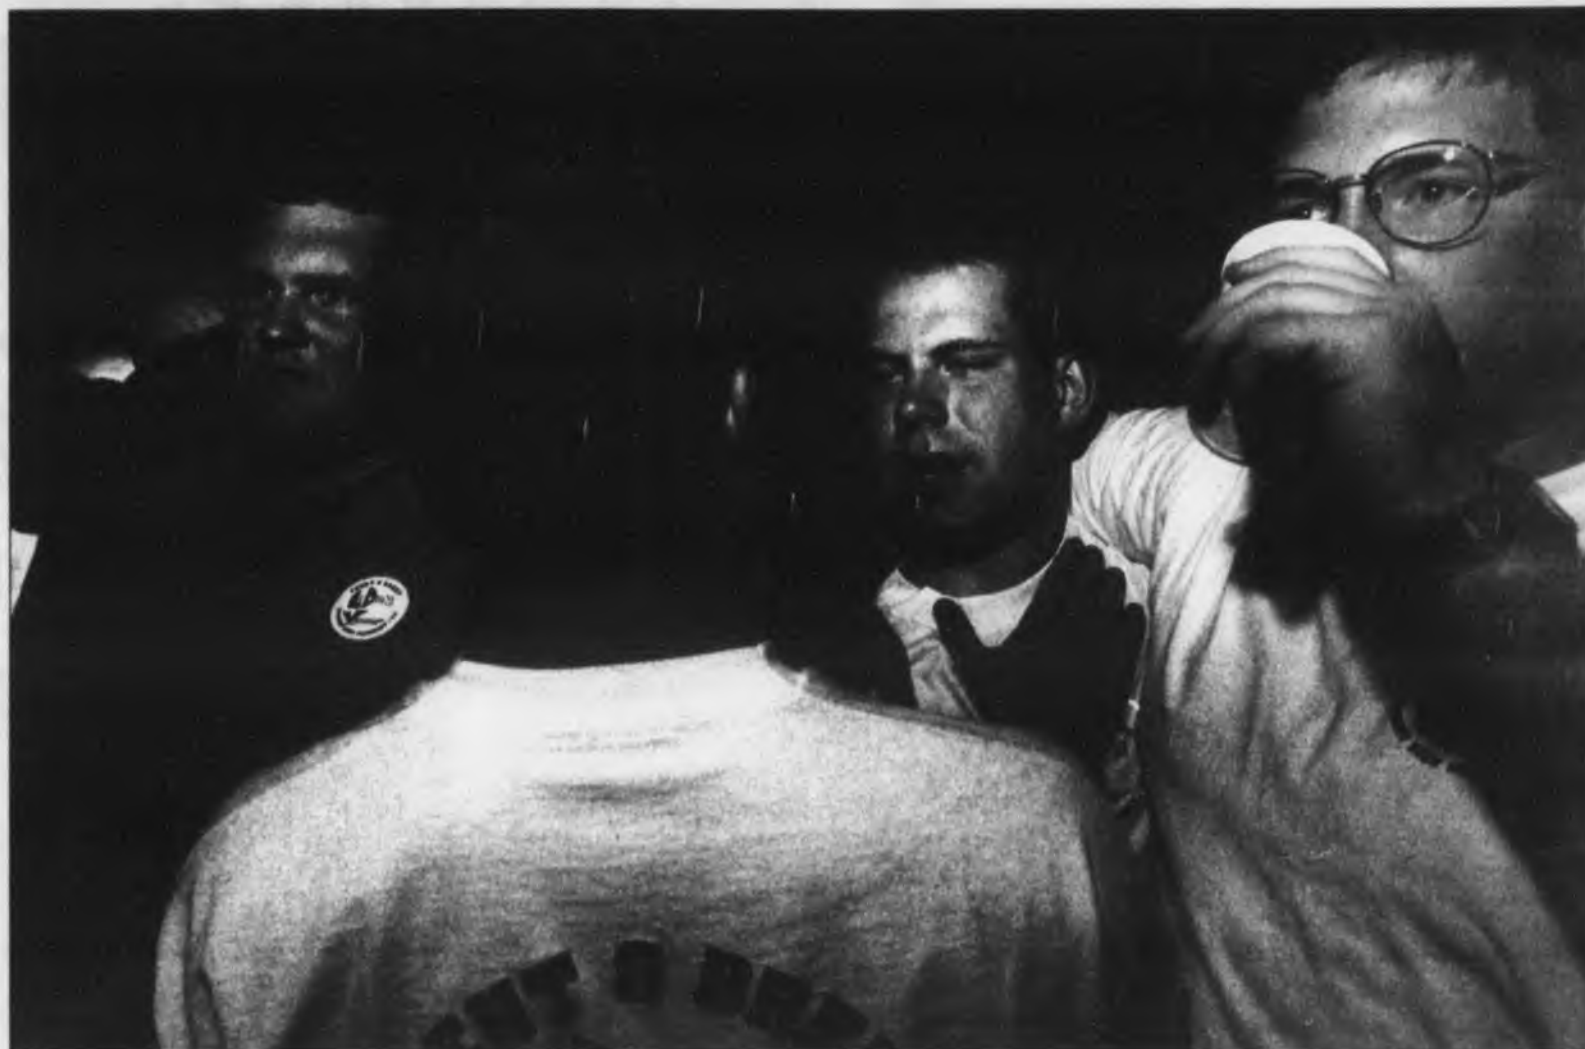

The disappointment was evident. Friends shook their hands and hugged them.

LeDoux took it with his chin up.

"We ran a good race. I wish Chris (Hansen) and Aaron (Otto) good luck. I'll do whatever I can do to help make their transition smooth," LeDoux said.

Wiedeman, with tears in his eyes, nodded his head in agreement with LeDoux about their effort.

"We stand on our issues. Everything happens for a reason," Wiedeman said.

Jesus Christ was a real man. He lived nearly two thousand years ago. His life, ministry, death and resurrection are well documented in history. He gave sight to the blind, he walked on water, he raised the dead, and he taught the common people. His life was full of miraculous happenings. It is said, "He was the kindest man who ever lived." Today, some say he was only a good teacher, but he said he was God, then he is not a good teacher. He was either a liar or a gifted madman. His disciples gave their lives for the sake of spreading his message. They were the first hand witnesses, and they were convinced of his claims.

The teacher of Jesus is easy to understand. He said, "Come to me all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn from me for I am gentle and humble of heart, and you will find rest for your souls." He also said, "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me." Millions of people have, just like you and me through the ages, put their trust in Him as Savior and Lord. Have all of those people been fooled? Have people believed in Jesus as their Savior in vain? Or is he, "the Christ, the Son of the living God," and "the resurrection and the life," as he said?

Please, seriously consider his claims and investigate the New Testament. Call the phone number available 24 hours during Jesus Week, and talk to someone who believes in Jesus. You could ask them why they believe, or what Jesus has done for them. John 3:16 sums it up so well, God loved the world so much, he gave his one and only son, that if anyone will believe in him, he will not perish, but have everlasting life.

Do you have questions about Jesus? Call 539-4844

COLLEGIAN opinion

Voter apathy dominates elections again

You get what you deserve and deserve what you get.

Voter turnout is significantly down from last year's election — almost 1,000 votes less. What is the problem? Do you want to vote in class? Do you want the ballots brought to your home? Or are you even lazier than that?

Every student is affected by elections. Even if you go to class and then go straight home, you still pay student fees. Student Senate decides student fees. The apathetic masses should at least turn out and vote for student senators.

If you use Lafene Health Center, exercise at the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex, see movies at the Union, see a play at McCain Auditorium or read the Collegian, you are affected by student government.

But most of you do not give a damn, do you? "Why do I care? I'm a senior, and I'm leaving" and "I don't know any of the issues or the candidates" are just excuses — and pitiful ones at that.

Granted, the editorial board thought maybe the turnout would be a little lower than last year because voting in the Union was reduced to one day. But we never expected a decrease of 1,000 votes.

With voting in the food centers and the college buildings, students should have had easier access to voting. The turnout should have gone up if anything.

Frankly, we are sick and tired of writing about voter apathy.

If you do not vote, you essentially do not have a voice. The next time you think Student Senate, the student body president or the Union Governing Board does something incredibly stupid, keep it to yourself.

For those who did vote, the Collegian editorial board cheers for you. (By the way, the entire editorial board voted in the elections.) Those who did vote should consider themselves powerful students. You are part of that 10-15 percent that decides the future of K-State.

Next year, when you pick up the Collegian and do not like something Senate did, tough. Just keep your griping to yourself, because those of us who actually did take the time to vote do not have a lot of sympathy if things do not go your way.

spring conquering fever

Spring has finally sprung. As I'm writing, it is 52 degrees out with no snow in sight. The weather finally matches my mood. Having spring fever when snow is falling is no fun.

I love spring. Unfortunately it's a season that rarely spends much time around these parts.

Spring is a reason for people with chicken legs to run around in shorts. It marks the beginning of student elections, when construction paper signs bloom like so many mushrooms on the trees.

(Please remember to recycle all of the paper. Be nice to the planet, and it will be nice to you.)

Going a little weird in the spring is perfectly OK and acceptable. All the sap is rising and everything is starting to reproduce there's no reason we shouldn't be affected, too.

So in the spirit of spring fever, "A Midsummer's Night Dream" and all the other odes to spring that have been written, here is my list of fun stuff to do while it's warm — or cold depending on how crazy you want to seem.

► DON'T ALLOW SMOKING IN UNION

Editor,

So they want to sell tobacco in the K-State Student Union again? Well, I guess that is OK, but what will it ultimately lead to? Rumor has it, and Collegian articles and campus talk confirm, that some time in the near future smokers will think they also should have the right to smoke in our Union.

Well, now that is an altogether different concern. It is bad enough we have to walk through their offensive clouds of carcinogenic filth while walking into the Union. But now they want to bring their bad habits inside where we can all benefit from their declining health.

Does anybody else have a problem with this? I love dressing up nice to go out to eat. Even when I am seated on the other side of the restaurant, I come out smelling like smoke. It will be no different if we allow this type of plague to enter the Union.

Just imagine having that pleasant tobacco aroma as you try to enjoy your lunch-time meal or when going downstairs to deliver a letter, walking through that nice designated smoking area. Yeah right, like the smoke is going to obey those boundaries.

Basically, smoking in the Union is a bad thing. Though all students pay equally for use of the Union, it hurts non-smokers a lot more for smoking to be allowed than it does to have smokers smoke elsewhere.

Furthermore, if it is cold outside, I do not feel sorry for you if you are a smoker. If you are so unconcerned about the rest of us who are not voluntarily destroying our bodies, then you can wait to get your fix until you get home.

I mean, look, people. We have grown up in a generation that is fully aware of the damage that cigarettes do, and we all had the choice. So quit whining about your rights and start taking a little responsibility for your actions by being a little more considerate of us non-smokers. We have to put up with your disgusting habits in so many other facets of our lives. We do not have to tolerate tobacco's smoke and its harmful effects in our Union.

Finally, if you feel you have to smoke, then suck it up, and deal with the weather. If it is too cold and it makes you feel uncomfortable, here is an idea — quit smoking.

► TAIWAN COVERAGE NOT UNBIASED

Editor,

The issue of Taiwan has received tremendous media coverage in this country so far. The media coverage came to a climax when the United States dispatched two aircraft carriers near the Taiwan Straits, followed by Japanese warships.

We, the Chinese Students and Scholars' Association at K-State, are disappointed to find the coverage is heavily stereotyped against China. For instance, a small protest against mainland China could receive heavy coverage, while the largest demonstration of 100,000 people against independence in Taipei, days before the election, was nowhere to be found in the media coverage here.

In an effort to at least avoid misunderstandings and offer different opinions, we consider it necessary to voice our opinion.

Taiwan is one province of China. This fact dates back to the Qin Dynasty, more than 2,000 years ago. That is why the Chinese people in mainland China and Taiwan are now speaking the same language and sharing the same cultural roots and religions. Though it was occupied by the Dutch, the Spanish and the Japanese for short periods of time, Taiwan has always remained part of China.

After the end of World War II in 1945, Taiwan was returned to China. Since then, Taiwan was ruled by the Chinese Nationalist Party. Despite the political struggle between two parties, Taiwan, a political entity as it is, has always been regarded as one province of China, by both the Nationalist and Communist Parties.

Meanwhile, almost all countries including the United States officially recognize Taiwan as one province of China, and the People's Republic of China is the sole representative of China.

Some may argue the Chinese government has never ruled Taiwan, so how can it claim sovereignty over Taiwan now? This is an invalid argument since the Taiwan issue is not just a political one between two political parties, but rather an issue directly related to the integrity of the Chinese sovereignty, which should be eternal and go beyond the struggle between political parties.

To understand the Taiwan issue better, let us review the history of the Civil War. Almost 150 years ago, President Lincoln ordered the armies to fight against the southern states that declared independence after democratically electing a government. Now mainland China is in the same boat as President Lincoln in defending its own integrity against a small number of separatists.

Democracy and independence are always intentionally mixed up by some people in the Taiwan issue. If you are against the independence of Taiwan, then you are against democracy in Taiwan. This is a very effective tactic to win sympathy and support from Western countries. However, we think democracy and independence are two totally different issues. Taiwan has no right to separate from China, whether or not there has been a democratic election.

We also urge foreign countries to stop intervening in the Taiwan issue. Let the Chinese people make our own decisions. In fact, the tension between the Taiwan Straits has been intensified because of the foreign intervention.

The situation was getting better between the Taiwan Straits until the U.S. government granted a visa to T. H. Lee. The dispatch of American warships reminded Chinese people painfully of the Western "warship diplomacy" against China one century ago, an experience of humiliation for all Chinese people.

The U.S. Congress recently passed a resolution to defend Taiwan. We think the U.S. Congress has no right to interfere with internal affairs of China, including the Taiwan issue. The reason is simple: China is an independent country, not the territory of the United States.

Despite the difficulty, we are quite confident we can defend our nation's sovereignty. We look forward to the day when mainland China and Taiwan are united in a way acceptable to both sides.

► COLUMN STEREOTYPED CONSERVATIVES

Editor,

In regards to Scott Allen Miller's April 5 column, it seems he has no problem stereotyping and making a universal statement condemning a specific ideology as being more "dangerous." I find this disturbing because he has made the assumption people like Timothy McVeigh, Terry Nichols and now the Freemen are conservatives. This is an incorrect assumption. Their actions are those of anarchists. They want to rid themselves of our government altogether, not reform it.

You'll never see these radicals run for political office or work within the system for change, like real conservatives would. I reject the notion they have any ideology that resembles President Reagan's, Sen. Bob Dole's or myself.

Also, perhaps Miller forgot all about those wonderful tree-squirrels in the Northwest, over-zealous environmentalists. Indeed, these are some dangerous liberals, all right.

What of the most famous left-wing extremist of all, the Unabomber? You see, these people are not a part of some larger political philosophy. Maybe they're just nuts. Most Muslims condemn the actions of the Trade Center bombers. That action doesn't represent what the majority of Muslims believe — just a small number of extremists. Do we then stereotype all Muslims? Of course not. That would be ridiculous.

What it all boils down to is there are a small number of morons everywhere, and no ideology has a monopoly on them — at least that's what my friends from PETA tell me.

Stoners, Bible beaters are alike

In the words of John Steinbeck, "I have always lived violently, drunk hugely, eaten too much or not at all, slept around the clock or missed two nights of sleeping, worked too hard and too long in glory or slobbered for a time in utter laziness, I've lifted, pulled, chopped, climbed ... and taken my hangovers as a consequence, not as a punishment ..."

So you can imagine the surprise of many of my friends when I decided to calm down and swing to the other side of the values spectrum. In other words, I went from one extreme to another.

I have been stereotyped with two different groups. I used to be grouped with the stoners when I actually pulled my share of bong hits.

Now because I have chosen to read the Bible over "High Times" and kneel before God instead of a six-foot bong, I am often grouped with Bible beaters.

I am neither a stoner nor a Bible beater.

I no longer smoke dope, and although I read the Bible, I have never physically assaulted anyone with the good book. But, I have noticed that — believe it or not — these two groups have something in common.

First of all, they are both out of the mainstream. They are at opposite ends of the scale, but they both know what it is like to be a minority.

Stoners have been persecuted by the cops. Christians were persecuted by the Romans, and now we are persecuted by the liberal sector of society. In fact, the Christians often persecute the stoners, and the stoners often persecute the Christians.

Dope smokers have their own interest groups, such as NORML (National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws). There is a movement to make its cause more widely accepted, and it is picking up steam.

Bible beaters have interest groups as well. The Christian Coalition is an example of one segment of society that is leading its own movement to make its cause more widely accepted. It too is picking up steam.

Jesus was eventually killed by the Romans because he proclaimed to the world that he was God.

Jerry Garcia was eventually killed by drugs, and the stoners proclaimed that he was God.

Myview

WILLIAM THOMAS

Stoners feel bonded to one another after matching bowls. Bible beaters feel bonded to one another after sharing prayer requests.

The most striking similarity is that neither group would ever dare to be seen hanging out with the other group.

Maybe that is the problem. Jesus hung out with people outside of his little clique. He hung out with lepers and tax collectors. Yeah, he got made fun of for it, but he still did it. He still cared about them as people. Jesus loves stoners, too.

I guess there is one difference between stoners and Christians. Jerry Garcia, no matter how good he was at the guitar, is still in the ground.

■ The New York Yankees played their home opener in conditions better suited to snowballs than baseballs. Snow, which began as flurries, escalated into blinding conditions as wind whipped through Yankee Stadium by late afternoon. Third base umpire Ken Kaiser wore a ski mask to combat the weather.

Snyder not really a bad guy

Yesterday afternoon I was able to attend my first football press conference.

As a freshman who started writing for the Collegian this semester, I had no idea what it would be like.

Sure, I had heard rumors about Coach Bill Snyder stating how much he does not like to cooperate with the media and how he does not like to talk about anything that might give something away about the secrecy of his team.

It is a fact that he rarely, if ever, allows the media to watch or talk to players during practice.

From hearing all this I expected to sit down and see Snyder as a person who would cut the media short when answering questions, not wanting to answer anything.

Boy, was I wrong.

Snyder came in nonchalantly wearing a brown suit and yellow tie, looking like quite a dignitary.

He sat down, and the questions started to flow.

When answering them, Snyder used a laid-back approach. In pretty good depth

Myview

JOHN Berggren

a calm voice, he would talk in pretty good depth about whatever he was asked.

One reporter asked him if he knew anything about Matt Miller quitting baseball.

Snyder came clean, saying in effect he had nothing to do with the matter and had not even talked to Miller about it.

He went on to offer information about Miller, who is reportedly working with his team as a student assistant.

He said Miller might be thinking about playing in the Canadian Football League.

As he was saying this, he pointed out the window of the Vanier Football Complex to Miller, who was running around the track inside KSU Stadium.

After hearing Snyder spit out all this information, I was shocked that he was as giving as he was. One would think the Miller situation would be closed doors to the media.

Listening to Snyder at the press conference yesterday gave me a whole new view on him.

Snyder is a classy individual who does only what is best for his football program. You have got to admit, he is doing a damn good job.

He is not the type of coach who has a hissy every time the media stick him with a tough question like a Lou Holtz or a Bobby Bowden.

He is a rational person who does not fly off the handle.

Sure, the media do not know every little entity about his team.

That is probably why his team is so good. Nobody knows anything about his team for sure until the first game of the season.

I know college coaches read newspapers and watch television. They are not going to find out anything from either about Snyder's team.

Another thing that surprised me was the friendliness of the players I got a chance to interview.

I was able to talk to Martin Gramatica, Chad Romano, Nyle Wren and Travis Ochs.

Surprisingly, Wren was the nicest of the group. One would think that in this day and age of athletics, a person who gets in the trouble Wren got into last semester would be sick of the media.

Through all the attention Wren received and all the court dates, Wren still loves to talk to the media.

Wren has stepped into a position this year where he will be looked upon as one of the leaders on the defensive line with the losses of Dirk Ochs and Tim Colston.

He said his position this year was almost fatherly, looking over all the players who do not have much experience.

"I'm the oldest guy this year, and I'm going to have to play like I am," Wren said.

"This year is a little different because I'm in a role model situation. I'm kind of like a dad to the younger guys. I do everything I can to help them through whatever problems they have."

Another thing that caught my eye was there were no big heads in the conference room. It seems like most of the time when teams come off great seasons, like the Wildcats did, they get a little over-confident.

That was not the case yesterday. Everyone kept things in perspective.

This team has not achieved what it set out to do. Winning the Holiday Bowl is not good enough.

It seems that the only thing the Cats will be happy with is a Big 12 championship or a national title.

There is still a way to go for the Cats if they want to chase such prestigious honors as those, but it does not appear to be that far away.

Under Snyder, I think the Cats have a chance at someday going all the way. His composure and well-disciplined team could make that day sooner than we think.

Cats can't find home plate

Shana Newell
sports editor

After a 13-6 routing Wednesday by the Nebraska Cornhuskers, the K-State baseball team has got to be asking itself what is wrong.

In a season that began with a 5-0 start — the best for a K-State club since 1989 — the Wildcats have been in a slump of late. Through its first 15 games, K-State scored 158 runs, or an average of 10.53 runs per game.

K-State scored 90 runs through its first five games, a modern-day school record. The Cat offense also averaged 11.4 hits per game, 7.5 walks per game and 1.93 stolen bases per contest.

Through its first 28 games, K-State scored 267 runs on the season, an average of 9.54 runs per game. That figure was the 12th-best run scoring number in the nation before the Missouri series, five games ago.

That was then. This is now.

In its last five games (two against Nebraska and three against Missouri), K-State has managed only 15 runs total for an average of three runs per game. It has also averaged only 8.8 hits per game.

So, what's wrong?

Coach Mike Clark said he doesn't know.

"We've chewed them. We've patted them on the backs.

I'm not sure what's wrong with them. I'm not sure what's wrong with us," he said.

With lineup changes happening on almost a game-to-game basis, one would wonder if that might be the cause, but Clark said it was not.

"I don't necessarily think it's the lineup," he said. "It's what's going on in those guys' heads when they're at the plate."

Clark went on to point out that the batters were too busy aiming for the fences.

In Wednesday's game, going into the ninth inning, the Cats had only five ground-outs compared to 12 fly-outs. The rest of the at-bats were strike outs aside from one hit by catcher Mike Gardner, a double in the sixth which scored K-State's first two runs.

But the cold bats aren't the only thing hurting the Cats. Poor pitching has also contributed to the losses, although not at quite the same levels.

Under the guidance of first-year pitching coach Mike Hensley, the Cats' hurlers combined ERA was the best in the Big 8 at 4.75 heading into the Missouri series. The Wildcats had struck out 222 hitters in 244.2 innings worked. The staff has walked just 136 hitters.

But with a combined 42 runs driven in against Cat pitchers in the last five games, that pitching efficiency is in jeopardy.

K-State's starter against Nebraska, Jon Oiseth, gave up 10 runs in the first three innings.

"Jon didn't have his good stuff today and got us in a hole," Clark said.

But Hensley is quick to point out, the fault was not all Oiseth's.

"He made some good pitches, but we booted the ball around," he said, referring to some bad fielding decisions in the first trio of innings. "He didn't throw near as bad as the score indicates. He needs to be able to step up, but he didn't pitch that bad."

K-State was led offensively by Gardner and short stop Heath Schesser who went 1-of-3 from the plate, including his fourth homer of the year.

K-State falls to 3-7 in the conference and 19-14 overall as Nebraska improves to 5-8 in the Big 8 with a 16-18-1 record overall. With the loss, and an Iowa State sweep of Oklahoma State earlier this week, the Cats fall to last place in the league.

► SPRING FOOTBALL

SHANE KEYSER/Collegian

Kevin Lockett plays catch with former quarterback Matt Miller during Wednesday's spring practice. Lockett is expected to lead the Wildcats' receiving corps in the first season of the Big 12.

Snyder expects Lockett to lead Cats' receivers

Shane McCormick
contributing writer

Through the years, Coach Bill Snyder's teams have put together a consistent group of quality wide receivers. Things will not be much different heading into the first year of Big 12 play.

Leading the way will be senior all-American Kevin Lockett.

Last season, Lockett produced a tremendous junior season. Lockett led all Big 8 receivers in 1995 with 56 catches for 797 yards. His 13 touchdown catches were seventh in the nation.

This season, Lockett will be regarded as one of the top receivers in college football.

But wide receivers coach Greg Peterson said there will not be any added pressure on Lockett this season.

"Since his first year, Kevin has had a lot of success, and he's learned to handle any pressure that came with it," he said.

"I don't expect him to have any more pressure on him than he's had before."

Missing from last year's receiving corps are 1,000-yard receivers Mitch Running and Tyson Schwieger. The leading candidate to fill one of those starting roles is senior Jimmy Dean.

In limited action last season, Dean caught eight passes for 76 yards.

With his blazing speed, Dean has already drawn comparisons to former all-American Andre Coleman.

But Peterson said junior Andre Anderson is a player who could really surprise some people.

"Andre has really elevated his game," he said. "He's a powerful receiver. He's coming into his own. People are going to wonder where he's been."

Catching the ball at K-State is not the only thing the receivers have excelled at. Through the years, the Cats' wide receivers have established themselves as tremendous blockers down the field.

"We really try to develop an attitude of toughness with our blocking," Peterson said.

"We really take pride in our wide receivers' blocking ability."

Coming into the season, Lockett will be the only returning starter from last year's receiving corps.

It might be expected for Lockett to be the senior vocal leader with the group of inexperienced receivers.

But Peterson said Lockett is more the type to lead by example, with his production on the field.

PART THREE: THE WIDE RECEIVERS

MUSIC REVIEW

'Honeydogs' bite into lost love, show versatility

Bill Bontempo
staff writer

If the Honeydogs had recorded a rap track on their compact disc "Everything, I Bet You," they would have successfully recorded an album that lives up to its name. Thankfully, the Honeydogs chose not to attempt a rap track on the CD, as it may be the only musical style they could not pull off.

Listeners should be glad the band decided not to stick to any particular musical style.

"Everything, I Bet You" is an experiment in versatility, spanning a variety of sounds and combining an array of styles to produce a highly enjoyable recording.

The Honeydogs' first offering, titled "Your Blue Door," sounds like the Gin Blossoms or Toad the Wet Sprocket.

Other tracks, such as "Miles Away," are more similar to the late '70s or early '80s mainstream country music sound.

On all tracks the Honeydogs combine a folk, country and mainstream sound that, in most cases, is appealing listening or better.

The country sound would almost be complete on tracks like "Miles Away" and "Over You" if lead vocalist Adam Levy had more twang in his voice.

It is probably better for the band that Levy has a more gritty voice.

Levy's voice is perfect for the harder, pool hall rock 'n' roll songs "Glee" and "Busy Man," and on songs like these the Honeydogs are at their best.

Somewhere between the Rolling Stones and Soul Asylum, the Honeydogs produce a sound that works perfectly for them.

More mellow tracks, such as "Miriam," contain a folk sound that could easily be contained on the Grateful Dead's "American Beauty," and again, Levy's voice does not seem to fit the sound.

The lyrics on the album are primarily based on the blues and themes consistent with other rock bands. "One more hard luck gin-soaked story," a line from the lyrics of "Glee," is just one example.

It seems the Honeydogs are content with lyrics that focus primarily on lost love, other relationship issues and life problems created by a good amount of barroom patronage.

They avoid trying to tackle social issues in their writing, which I found refreshing.

The themes may be hackneyed, but each song uses lyrics suited to the style of music.

Promoters tend to shy away from bands who lack a definitive sound, and "Everything, I Bet You" will probably not receive much radio airplay due to the diverse nature of the album.

Those who limit their music listening to popular radio will miss out on a fine sample of good music, but music enthusiasts who enjoy hearing new twists on popular sounds will appreciate the Honeydogs' attempt at versatility and may find a few gems on this CD.

► History of American Agriculture had to be dropped from the Fall '96 semester due to the Department of History's tight budget.

Rick Druse
staff reporter

Making a class schedule that fits your needs like a glove can be a stressful and frustrating project, especially when a class you are counting on has been dropped for the semester.

That is exactly what happened with History of American Agriculture, which was going to be offered by the Department of History for fall 1996.

"The budget is tight, and we did not have the funding for that," Don Mrozek, head of the history department, said. "Things are particularly tight and really have been particularly tight for a couple of years."

In fact, the class never had the funding when it was added to the fall 1996 line schedule. It was a prospective class, so it was added to the schedule and then dropped before pre-enrollment, Mrozek said.

"The course itself is one that we wanted to offer for some time, but money is tight everywhere," Mrozek said.

He said money has been so tight in the department that two classes are being taught by retired professors for free.

Mrozek does not deny the addition of the class to the department would be a plus. He said the class would be able to cover the missions of undergraduate and graduate students.

"It's not that the dean or the provost have lack of appreciation about it or question it. It's simply just a shortage of funds," Mrozek said.

He said the department tried to get funds outside the University that allow project grants. Due to these funds, classes in environmental history were able to be covered, Mrozek said.

The department is undergoing a five-year evaluation, and part of the area being evaluated is the agricultural and environmental history classes, Mrozek said.

"There is a strong interest among faculty in the College of Agriculture that we do something similar and be able to restore the offering of agricultural history on a regular basis," Mrozek said.

He said if the department could find funding for the class, it would be available.

"I'm really disappointed. I have been planning on it for a year and a half," Bonnie Hamer, instructor of history, said. "My objective is to offer it within the Department of History so that it becomes a core part of what the history department goals are in terms of their contribution to the whole campus."

Hamer said the class is listed in the college catalog but has not been offered for several semesters. She said students who are complaining to her are not history majors.

"There's no question that agriculture history is very much tailored to meeting the social science and humanities requirements for students in the College of Agriculture," Hamer said.

She said history is the only department that will cross-reference agriculture for social science and humanities credit. The secondary major of natural resources and environmental science is hit hardest by not offering the class, Hamer said.

"I was excited about coming to this school in a large part because I saw a real opportunity for a program in history and in agriculture that could be nationally recognized as a place where students can come out with a well-rounded appreciation of agriculture," Hamer said. "History of agriculture should be central to the mission of Kansas State University."

► RECREATION

City offers outdoor fun

Manhattan is full of opportunities for outdoor enthusiasts

Jill Story
staff reporter

Opportunities for outdoor recreation are plentiful in Manhattan.

Nestled in the northern Flint Hills, outdoor enthusiasts can enjoy the lightly forested scenery of the Little Apple while taking in the sunshine and fresh air.

Manhattan boasts 27 parks of all kinds. If walking or jogging is something you enjoy, City, CiCo and Linear parks all have special paths available.

"I enjoy using the trail at City Park, especially on beautiful afternoons. I'm glad to have such a nice place to walk so close to where I live," Heather Fretz, K-State and Manhattan Christian College student, said.

A big draw for outdoorsmen and fun-seekers in and around Manhattan is Tuttle Creek State Park, located eight miles north of Manhattan on Kansas Highway 24 at mile marker 312. Tuttle Creek covers 1,156 acres and offers ball diamonds, children's playgrounds, a rugby field and boating opportunities in season. Camping areas are also available at a cost of $5 per night.

Parking for the day at the state park will cost you $4, or you can buy a permit that lasts for a year and can be used at all state parks in Kansas. That permit costs $30.

The entire Tuttle Creek area, most of which is open to the public, has 165 miles of shoreline and 16,000 surface acres of water. It is a popular retreat for University students and residents alike, who use the area for camping, fishing, mountain biking, sail boating, wind surfing and sunbathing when the weather permits.

"Tuttle Creek is a very diverse recreational area. There is so much you can do. My husband and I have biked, gone swimming and played softball out there. More people should take advantage of the outdoor facilities available in this area," Amy Glover, Abilene resident, said.

If you were not thinking of getting quite that close to nature, another good place to visit might be the Wildcat Creek Sports Center.

"We are brand new and still under construction, but we have all kinds of wholesome outdoor activities," Jonathan Fateley, Wildcat Creek manager, said.

Sand volleyball, batting cages, a driving range and a miniature golf course are all available for those seeking some fun in the great outdoors.

If you are going to be around for a while, the sand volleyball leagues cost $70 for a six-week session. That guarantees the teams two games a week and unlimited free play when games are not scheduled. Or you may want to bring a group of friends for a day or evening of fun for a cost of $5 an hour per court.

There are nine sand volleyball courts, all with professional net suspension systems. The courts are well-lit at night.

Batter up at Wildcat Creek's batting cage at $1 for 18 pitches, or rent the cage for half an hour or an hour at a time.

If you would rather hit balls of a different kind, the driving range has 30 tee pads and a 280-yard range. A bucket of 50 balls costs $3.75, and 110 balls are $7.

Manhattan's only miniature golf course is located at Wildcat Creek. Fees are $3.75 for adults, $3.25 for kids from 7 to 12 years old, $2 for ages 4 to 6, and free for ages 3 and for Hansen and Otto, agreed.

"I believe that Hansen and Otto were the only two candidates who mean what they say, have researched their plans and ideas and know what it takes to communicate and encourage involvement. They are the most qualified," Rothwell said.

Hansen and Otto's campaign focused on teacher evaluations, campus safety and tuition retention, Hansen said. He also said he felt he and Otto had done a good job campaigning.

"We've done our best to relay to students what we feel is important and to explain that we are committed to what we've promised," Hansen said.

Surrounded by red balloons and a banner reading, "Hansen. The Otomatic choice," the party grew still louder as the pair's supporters congratulated them.

"This is the most awesome thing that could happen to K-State. I'm elated," Rothwell said.

Rothwell was not the only one happy about the outcome of the election.

"They worked so hard. The campaign was all-consuming for quite some time," said Alice Williams, sophomore in German and international studies.

While the campaigning might be through, the work is just beginning.

"As I understand it, we take over two Thursdays from now," Otto said. "We're going to hit the ground running."

think it makes it a lot easier."

Jeff Wagner, senior in sociology, said there were not any issues that were of great concern to him.

He said he voted only because he knows someone running, and probably would not have voted if he did not know anyone on the ballot.

Some students said they had not voted and did not plan on doing so.

"I just got into the College of Ag, and I have not spent enough time getting to know the candidates and their views," Heidi Byard, freshman in agribusiness, said.

Tara Sunderman, senior in elementary education, said she did not vote and did not plan to do so. "I'm a senior and really don't care," she said.

Sunderman said she had not paid much attention to the campaigns, and the only issue she paid attention to was making professor evaluations public.

"I just think that the teacher evaluations should be made public. That's the only issue I knew about," she said.

Whether your taste in outdoor fun is trap shooting, golf, hiking, fishing or just taking a leisurely walk, Manhattan has a lot to offer for people of all ages.

ECONOMICS

Study shows Kansas benefits from highway repair

Richea Lecklider
staff reporter

K-State economists have proven the state reaps benefits from highway construction and repair.

Michael Babcock and the late Jarvin Emerson, both professors of economics, set out two years ago to prove the benefits of highway maintenance outweigh the costs, a belief Kansas legislators commonly share.

"The study shows that the economic benefits of the highway program exceed the cost. The highway program is a good investment," Babcock said.

The state legislature often asks the Kansas Department of Transportation about economic impacts concerning highways.

It was decided a study should be funded, he said.

Babcock said there is a transresearch program called K-TRAN, sponsored by KDOT, which allocates money for research.

After competing for money by sending in a research proposal, Babcock and Emerson received a $50,000 grant from KDOT.

"The most beneficial thing about the research is that we can measure the economic impacts of different types of highway projects," Babcock said.

Babcock said different types of questions can be answered because he and Emerson looked at six different factors during their research.

He said they studied bridge repair, new bridge construction, new road construction, resurfacing, reconstruction and a category concerning all other types of maintenance and repair.

"We did economic impacts for each of the types," Babcock said.

By studying KDOT contracts totaling $827.8 million, the economists found they produced $187.2 million in wages and salaries in the construction industry and $241.6 million in wages and salaries in industries which supply materials for the construction industry.

Babcock and Emerson also found through these contracts $2.2 billion was generated in production for the state through industries connected to highway projects.

The contracts proved thousands of jobs have been provided for people due to the highway projects.

Babcock said investment in highway construction and repair benefit highway travelers as well.

Improvements to highways can reduce the costs of operating vehicles, reduce average travel times and lower the risk of accidents on highways.

Nicole Benoit, freshman in elementary education, who lives in Ford Hall, said she thought having polling stations at Derby Food Center this year was a good idea.

"A lot of my friends voted on the way to dinner," she said. "It was handy for them."

Benoit said safety was probably her biggest concern, and she voted for Hansen and Otto.

"I'm in a sorority, and they came in and spoke to us. I thought what they said was really good," she said.

Jason Whitcomb, sophomore in secondary education, who lives in Moore Hall, also said having polling stations near the residence halls was a good idea.

"I didn't vote there because I just happened to have a class when they opened voting. If not, I probably would have voted there," he said. "I

► STUDENT ELECTIONS '96

Voter turnout decreases

■ Smaller number of voters creates speculation from SGA

Portia Sisco
staff writer

Despite the few straggling signs and chalk marks on campus, the elections are definitely over for this year.

With a little over two-thirds of last year's turnout, there has been speculation as to why students did not vote.

Last year, 3,343 students voted in the student governing elections. This year the numbers fell to 2,440, a decrease of 903 student votes.

Chad Schneider, senior in architectural engineering, is the Elections Committee chair for the Student Governing Association.

Voter apathy and the number of candidates may have been the reason, Schneider said.

"There were two main candidates in the race. There was not much excitement, not like last year with Jeff and Liz. They were movers and shakers," Schneider said.

On Tuesday, almost 1,350 students voted, but numbers fell on Wednesday.

"The second day only 1,100 students voted. The colleges could have helped," Schneider said.

Over 300 students chose to vote in the dining centers, which were opened up as a poll site for the first time this year for two hours during the evening.

"I expected anywhere from 500 to 1,000 in Kramer and Derby," Schneider said.

► STUDENT SENATE

Senators prepare to end term, pass bill to restructure fees

Courtney Marshall
staff writer

The 1995-96 Student Senate will soon be coming to a close. Senators finalized bills that needed to be taken care of before the new term begins.

During second readings a bill from the Allocations Committee to restructure the SGA funding guidelines was sent back to committee for further revisions.

"We want to send it back to committee, take a look at it and take out all the fluff that's in it now and make it more user-friendly," Brent Wiedeman, agriculture senator, said.

A bill to restructure the student activity fee was moved out of committee and passed after three amendments were proposed, with one passing. The amendment removed unnecessary information from the bill.

The College Council Fee sub-line item budget of the student activity fee line item budget will be increased 15 percent and distributed accordingly to college councils.

► FARM BILL

Clinton signs ag reform act; farmers worry

J. Scot Bucholz
staff writer

Farmers finally have a farm bill. President Clinton signed into law House of Representative Bill 2854, the Federal Agricultural Improvement and Reform Act of 1996.

The law will cover most agriculture programs such as commodities, credit, conservation, rural development, trade and nutrition for the next seven years, beginning the fiscal year of 1996 and running through the fiscal year of 2002.

"I am signing H.R. 2854 with reservation because I believe the bill fails to provide an adequate safety net for family farmers," Clinton said in a speech transcript.

The president also said the fixed payments in the bill do not change with market conditions, which would leave farmers and the rural communities in which they live vulnerable to reductions in crop prices or yields.

"I am firmly committed to submitting legislation and working with the Congress next year to strengthen the farm safety net," Clinton said.

The President said he is aware farm legislation is long overdue, and American farmers need to know the conditions under which they are operating.

A spokesperson for Rep. Pat Roberts, R-Kan., the author of the Freedom to Farm Act, said Roberts is gratified Clinton signed the farm bill, and farmers now know with certainty the farm program for the next seven years.

"Signing up for the program will begin within 45 days," Roberts' spokesperson said.

"Freedom to Farm is a victory for farmers, consumers and taxpayers."

Larry Mitchell, vice president for government relations for the National Farmers Union, said the farmers' union still does not support this bill.

Mitchell said the farmers' union is unhappy because there is no safety net for crop insurance against future natural disasters for farmers.

There was legislation passed 18 months ago to help protect farmers with insurance, but now Congress has thrown it all out, Mitchell said.

"It is a different Congress that we are dealing with," he said.

► MULTIPLE SCLEROSIS WALK

MS Society hopes to raise $100,000 in eastern Kansas

Laurel Novell
staff writer

Participants in 12 towns across Kansas will be walking to raise money for the Multiple Sclerosis Society Saturday.

The Manhattan MS walk is scheduled to begin at 9 a.m. at St. Thomas More Church, 2900 Kimball Ave.

This is the fifth year Manhattan has sponsored the walk, said Janis Smischny, manager of the eastern Kansas branch of the MS Society.

The Eastern-Kansas Branch of the Mid-America Chapter of the MS Society hopes to raise $100,000 combined from all 12 walks.

The route will be nine miles long with an alternative three-mile course for anyone who wants to use it. Both courses will end at St. Thomas More with lunch provided by Subway, said Renelle Everett, chairman of the MS walk in Manhattan and senior in accounting. Money raised from the walk will be used to fund research on MS and local programs for MS sufferers.

Nancy Keyser-Shade, guest artist and alumna, leads by example during modern dance. Keyser-Shade, who now lives in Huntsville, Ala., choreographed a piece for SpringDance, which begins Friday.

Whether you're on a "Journey" or a "Quest," SpringDance '96 has an adventure for you.

SpringDance will feature new and unique talents with special guest artist Nancy Keyser-Shade, a K-State alumna, and student artist Steven Hoekstra, graduate student in psychology. Keyser-Shade visited K-State's campus last week to choreograph a selection entitled "Journey" for SpringDance with K-State dancers.

"Journey" is a modern selection using the Martha Graham technique, involving contraction and arm movements.

One of the students selected to participate in "Journey" was Shelby Jennings, junior in theater.

"The music is from a movie called 'The Mission.' We use a lot of our arms, and cupped hands," Jennings said.

The eight dancers selected for the movement had only one week of rehearsals with Keyser-Shade.

"We're ready to perform Nancy's piece except for some cleaning up," Jennings said.

Luke Kahlich, dance professor, taught Keyser-Shade when she was a student at K-State before she graduated in 1988.

"I think she was always interested in performing and performance choreography," Kahlich said. "And that's what she's doing."

Keyser-Shade also taught the dance lab class while she was at K-State.

"It's fabulous. I really like her. She always keeps us in a good humor. It's good to work with different teachers and styles," Jennings said.

Keyser-Shade lives in Huntsville, Ala. She stayed with her mother in Council Grove during her visit to K-State.

Hoekstra's "Quest" is also a modern piece that will be featured in SpringDance '96.

"He auditioned it in the fall also, but we (dance department staff) felt it had not reached the stage that it was ready for production. The design also fits better on McCain's stage than Nichols, where we perform WinterDance," Kahlich said.

There are only four dancers in "Quest," Hoekstra selected dancers he had worked with before.

"They have all known each other and danced together. It's timing and attitude. Knowing each other and being acquainted has helped Steve as a choreographer," Kahlich said.

Hoekstra concurred. "There are no unknown quantities," Hoekstra said.

The music selection for "Quest" is called "Wilderness" by The Choir.

"It's a piece of music I liked for a long time," Hoekstra said.

"It's mood-inspired and theme inspired. The dancers are dancing by themselves and relating to other people unawares."

Originally Hoekstra said he had not intended to dance in "Journey."

"I was told the movements looked good on me, too," Hoekstra said.

This will be Hoekstra's seventh show at K-State.

"It's a nice way for me to express myself. I know that some of it comes from me, but I choose to choreograph more psychologically different pieces. I enjoy movement for movement's sake. Expressing the music — it's a different approach than some people," Hoekstra said.

Preparation time has been a challenge for Hoekstra and his team of dancers.

Along with time limitations, they also have to coordinate rehearsal schedules.

"The major problem is getting the dancers together at the same time," Hoekstra said.

"I put the piece together in a few hours. We had much less rehearsal time than other pieces, except for the guest artist piece."

Other SpringDance selections will include "In the Beginning," choreographed by Kahlich, and "Genesis of a Ball," by Vera Orlock, dance instructor, which will involve the use of giant balls the dancers will move with their bodies.

▶ YOUNG GIRL DIES IN CRASH DURING ATTEMPT TO FLY SMALL PLANE

CHEYENNE, Wyo. (AP) — A 7-year-old girl who hoped to become the youngest person to fly cross-country was killed Thursday when her small plane nose-dived to the ground "like a dart" soon after taking off in driving rain and snow. Her father and her flight instructor also died.

Jessica Dubroff, who used a red booster seat and extenders so her legs could reach the control pedals, spoke to her mother by telephone even as she revved the engine on the runway.

Lisa Blair Hathaway said she heard no word of problems as the three began to take off and ended the communication.

"I beg people to let children fly if they want to fly," a teary-eyed Hathaway said before flying from Boston to Wyoming to claim her daughter's body.

She had flown ahead to Massachusetts to await the arrival of Jessica and her ex-husband.

"Clearly I would want all my children to die in a state of joy, but not at age 7," Hathaway said.

Jessica, her father, Lloyd Dubroff, and flight instructor Joe Reid began their journey Wednesday morning in Half Moon Bay, Calif., and spent the night in Cheyenne. They planned to arrive Friday in Falmouth, Mass.

▶ PROFESSOR COMPARES SURVIVAL OF INDIANS WITH SACRED BIRDS

The indigenous survivors, like the sacred birds they have traditionally worshiped, are still threatened. Like the mighty condor and the eagle, they are struggling for survival.

Harald Prins, professor of cultural anthropology, embodied this concept in his speech "The Condor and the Eagle" on the native rights issues in the Americas Thursday.

Prins chose the condor and the eagle because these two birds form an association between the indigenous people of North and South America.

"Since I wanted to talk about Native Rights issues in both North and South America, I thought, indeed, the title is appropriate," Prins said.

The North American Indians often consider the Bald Eagle and also the Spotted Eagle, messengers of the Great Spirit, Prins said. The eagle's feathers play a very important role in spiritual practices particularly in healing and blessing ceremonies.

Prins discussed the role eagles play in North American Indian religions and in the cultural traditions of Mexico's Indians, particularly the Aztecs.

Prins told a tale of a Lakota man who had a vision in which he was an eagle and how he went on to become a powerful and important medicine man.

He then told a myth relating on how the Sioux Nation was born and what role the eagle played in it.

The Aztec Nation had traditionally employed the eagle as its sacred bird, Prins said.

"The Spanish invaders ransacked and destroyed the mighty Aztec capital in 1521," Prins said.

"Yet, the Spanish colonial heirs of the conquerors have chosen this Aztec insignia of the eagle perched on the cactus as the emblem of modern Mexico."

It is a ritual form of robbery, Prins said.

In South America, the condor is considered sacred because it is associated with death and rebirth, Prins said.

He went on to discuss the status of the birds today and how they compare with the struggle of the Native Americans.

"While the mighty birds, the eagle and the condor, are more than sacred symbols, traditionally they represent the power, strength and success of the indigenous people," Prins said.

Yet like the indigenous people, these mighty birds themselves have become threatened in terms of their survival, he said.

"Typically indigenous peoples have been forced into a state of dependency, whether you talk about Canada, United States, Mexico, Brazil on down to Chile, the story is a sad repeat one after another," Prins said.

"They have been treated as if, at best, they were children, at worst, criminals or mental incompetents."

American Indians have seen their worlds collapse, Prins said.

"Ironically, the European newcomers, who brought so much violent destruction to the indigenous peoples of the western hemisphere, brought their own sacred bird to the Americas," he said.

Jesus Christ was a real man. He lived nearly two thousand years ago. His life, ministry, death and resurrection are well documented in history. He gave sight to the blind, he walked on water, he raised the dead, and he taught the common people. His life was full of miraculous happenings. It is said, "He was the kindest man who ever lived." Today, some say he was only a good teacher, but he said he was God. If he is not God, then he is not a good teacher. He was either a liar or a gifted madman. His disciples gave their lives for the sake of spreading his message. They were the first hand witnesses, and they were convinced of his claims.

The teaching of Jesus is easy to understand. He said, "Come to me all you who are weary and burdened, and I will give you rest. Take my yoke upon you and learn from me for I am gentle and humble of heart, and you will find rest for your souls." He also said, "I am the way and the truth and the life. No one comes to the Father except through me." Millions of people have, just like you and me through the ages, put their trust in Him as Savior and Lord. Have all of those people been fooled? Have people believed in Jesus as their Savior in vain? Or is he, "the Christ, the Son of the living God," and "the resurrection and the life," as he said?

Please, seriously consider his claims and investigate the New Testament. Call the phone number available 24 hours during Jesus Week, and talk to someone who believes in Jesus. You could ask them why they believe, or what Jesus has done for them. John 3:16 sums it up so well, God loved the world so much, he gave his one and only son, that if anyone will believe in him, he will not perish, but have everlasting life.

Board examines structure change

Laurel Novell
staff writer

Debate concerning the current organization of Student Publications Inc. was the focus of a Board of Student Publications Personnel Committee meeting Thursday.

Lin Bliss, chairman of the Personnel Committee, said the current structure of Student Publications Inc. needs to be changed to provide the board with a clearly defined role in control of Student Publications Inc.

Bliss used posters to illustrate the shortcomings in the organizational structure of Student Publications Inc. and to communicate two proposed structures.

He said the board needed a more clearly defined chain of command that would determine its role in certain situations, like personnel problems.

After the meeting, Bliss said why he believed the structure should be changed.

"The board is operating without a clearly defined structure," Bliss said. There is no written procedure to resolve conflicts between the board and staff, he said.

Bliss said the current responsibilities of the board include the hiring of executive editorial and management staff and the advisers of the Collegian and Royal Purple.

"This board is the boss of the corporation," Bliss said. "Well, don't say that. Say 'in charge.'"

Ann Foster, Student Publications business manager, said there is an organizational flow chart that outlined the chain of command.

The administrative flow chart for Student Publications Inc. has been filed with human resources at least since its last modification in March 1994.

"In order for job descriptions to be accepted by human resources, a flow chart must be included," Foster said.

The committee and Student Publications Inc. staff members present at the meeting discussed the role of the director position in the proposed structures.

Stephanie Fuqua, opinion editor for the Collegian, asked if under the proposed structures, the director would act as a supervisor or adviser.

Bliss said it was a question that still needed to be addressed.

Mike Marlett, editor in chief of the Collegian, said a director with supervisory powers could control the content of the paper, while an adviser wouldn't.

"The issue is not content. It's management," said Bill Feyerharm, board member and assistant dean of the College of Arts and Sciences.

The committee decided to address structure changes at a future board meeting so questions brought up at the meeting could be clarified and because of a full agenda scheduled for the Board meeting Monday.

Aaron Otto, chairman of the board, said the issue of adding members to the board would be discussed Monday.

After the meeting, Otto said he brought the need for representatives from Student Publications Inc. to the attention of the Board in January.

"It became clear last semester that we needed someone from Student Publications staff on the board," Otto said.

The committee also heard input from Marlett and the summer editor in chief, Claudette Riley, concerning summer circulation, then endorsed the proposal that the summer edition of the Collegian be published biweekly.

This board is the boss of the corporation. Well, don't say that. Say "in charge."

COMPUTER PROGRAM

Professor helps to define new speed limits

KDOT requests aid to develop program for determining safe speeds

Sara Edwards
staff writer

The new speed limits on Kansas two-lane highways seem confusing to many people, but they don't confuse a K-State professor who developed a computer program that helped determine the new speed limits.

Yacoub Najjar, assistant professor in the department of civil engineering, developed a program called Computational Neural Networks (CNNs). The program makes the computer process information like a human brain, Najjar said.

"This method came from the way humans think and use logic," he said.

The computer is given models or examples. Then it has to figure out solutions for related problems from what it learned from the examples.

The purpose of the CNNs program was to find the 85th-percentile speed. The 85th-percentile speed is the speed at which 85 percent of the people travel at or below on that section of the highway. This 85th-percentile speed would be used as a guide for the new speed limits.

"If they're driving at a speed that is comfortable, give them what they want," he said.

To develop a process to determine speeds on two-lane highways on the computer Najjar used factors from the Kansas Department of Transportation as input and the 85th-percentile speed as output for the training set model the computer followed.

KDOT gathered information from 88 sections of highway like shoulder width, shoulder type, average daily traffic and percentage of no-passing zones. It also determined the 85th-percentile speed drivers were traveling on the road.

The computer then used the above factors from 29 other sections as input to determine the 85th-percentile speed as its output as a test. Najjar's program proved to be 96.2 percent accurate at determining the actual speed that 85 percent of people drive at or below just by using these factors.

After his program was trained, he then used it to figure out the 85th-percentile speed for the 2,143 sections of Kansas two-lane highways.

He said his program saved KDOT time, because it doesn't have to go out and determine the 85th-percentile speed by hand. It saves manpower.

He said this information was used along with accident reports to determine the new speeds for Kansas two-lane highways.

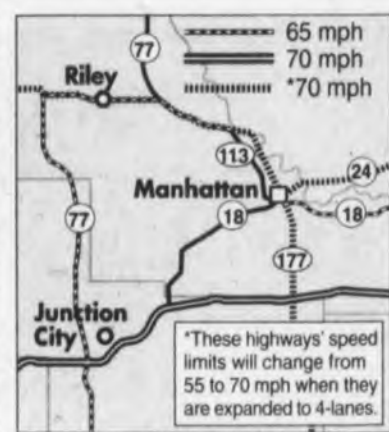

Ken Miller, KDOT spokesman, said KDOT takes input from six district engineers, state legislatures and the general public as well as the results of the computer program to propose new speed limits.

He said after the district engineers make the final decision, the signs will be posted.

He said KDOT should be finished with the new signs by June 1, weather permitting. The total cost of replacing the signs is $340,000.

Najjar said although the computer determined some speeds could be faster than 65 miles per hour, which is the maximum state law allows.

Najjar said his program has multiple uses other than determining speed limits. It can be used for environmental problems, determining the movement of contaminated ground water and food safety.

Najjar said he wrote the CNNs program 2-1/2 years ago. KDOT contacted him around the time of winter break.

He put in 140 hours of computer time for KDOT for free.

Speaker explains how determination leads to success

Successful businessman speaks in Forum Hall about experiences, teamwork and cooperation. He believes knowing people is the key to success.

AbdullNaser T. Abdullah
staff reporter

Harvey Mackay lit up a tightly packed Forum Hall with experiences that led him to become a successful businessman Thursday.

Mackay, chairman of Mackay Envelope Corp., started his speech by holding up a plaque with a square, a circle and a triangle on it and asked members of the audience to choose one of the shapes.

Most of the audience chose the circle, which, as Mackay said, shows that they are more interested in booze and sex rather than intelligence and creativity.

Mackay then started by saying there is hardly anything we cannot accomplish. "Believe in yourself when no one else does," Mackay said.

Mackay recalled how the efforts to bring the Super Bowl to Minnesota in 1992 seemed impossible. Nobody thought it could be done, even the people in Minnesota, he said.

"Things are not always what we perceive them," Mackay said.

Mackay referred to the Atlanta Olympics. Everybody thought it was going back to Athens since it is the 100th Olympiad, he said. The Greeks thought they had the Olympics in the bag, but in the end it was Atlanta who won it, he said.

Determination and belief are the way to success in life, Mackay said.

"There is a ton of competition out there," Mackay said.

Students have to work harder today because of increasing tuition, taking care of families, working and socializing, Mackay said.

Students are in the best atmosphere to be prepared to snatch an opportunity, he said.

When hiring someone, Mackay has several techniques.

"The ability to recognize ability is scarce," Mackay said. People who have this ability are likely to be hired, he said.

Mackay would meet the applicant 10 to 12 times at different places. Mackay said he always interviews an applicant at the applicant's home to meet the wife and kids and get to know them better. Mackay would also invite applicants to play golf or tennis to get to know them better.

Knowing people personally seems to be the goal to Mackay's success.

"People don't care what you know about them when they know that you care about them," Mackay said.

Mackay started a Rolodex file since he was 18 years old. Today, he has more than 6,000 entries of people he knows around the globe.

Publishing checkpoint won't aid drunks

QUICKread

► Publishing the DUI checkpoints will hinder, not aid, drunk drivers.

There will be some people reciting the alphabet backwards this weekend, and it will keep some drunks off the road.

You may have noticed we published the location of a sobriety checkpoint scheduled for this weekend. Contrary to what some may think, we did not print it to tell the drunks of where to steer clear.

We are not warning drunks to stay away from the fuzz. If they get sloppy drunk, chances are they won't remember to avoid the checkpoint anyway.

The checkpoint is all the more reason to designate a keymaster for this weekend before you start drinking.

We printed it for those non-drinkers living near the checkpoint. Knowing it is there could reduce the inconvenience of traffic back-ups. It is logical knowledge of the checkpoint that will deter someone going out to drink from driving. They'll know to give keys to a sober friend or abstain from drinking for the evening.

The sobriety checkpoint is also a reminder to those who may drive drunk that the community of Manhattan doesn't appreciate it.

Hopefully, it will deter them from drinking and driving because they know someone cares for the driver's lives, and maybe more importantly, the lives of sober drivers on the road.

Publishing the location today may save lives in the future. If drivers aren't sure where a checkpoint may be next weekend, they will be scared to drive drunk and risk being apprehended.

It is just smart business not to drink and drive when you know for certain there will be a checkpoint. Call a cab or ask a friend. Don't risk the DUI.

COLLEGIAN EXHIBITS LIBERAL BIAS

Editor,

Is it me, or is the Collegian drifting toward a stronger left-bias every day? Among Jason Hamilton, Scott Allen Miller and the Toles cartoon, one could come to the conclusion that Dick Gephardt is the opinion editor of our school paper.

I realize the Collegian can lay claim to one conservative writer, William Thomas Burdette, but I have yet to see him use name-calling to the degree Miller demonstrated in his April 5 column "Liberals less dangerous to public than conservatives."

Just reading over Hamilton's "Home-grown terrorism" and Miller's opinions, I realized their supporting arguments are not even logical. They claim that according to precedents set in Ruby Ridge, Idaho; Waco, Texas; the Rodney King incident and the recent Mexican immigrant beatings, that the Montana Freemen have nothing to worry about because they are white.

On the contrary, Ruby Ridge and Waco both resulted in multiple deaths. Not broken bones or bruises, but deaths. Give me a butt-kicking any day over getting shot.

Let us also remember that King and the "immigrants" were criminals on the run. King was a car thief. The "immigrants" were illegal aliens. Which is more extreme — getting beat because you stole a car or getting shot because you wrote bad checks?

The Freemen, King and the immigrants were all criminals in each case and should have been dealt with according to the law, but I strongly doubt that federal agents will be any lighter on the trigger because of the Freemen's skin color or political beliefs.

I could go on and on about what is wrong with these columns, but the question is for the Collegian. Shouldn't there be a point at which the opinion editor says, "There is no logic to your supporting arguments, and this lacks the class of an unbiased, polished writer."

The road to easy street

Myview

LACH
Franquemont

Let me tell ya a story. When I got out of the army, I traveled around a bit and then took up a job doing masonry. For close to a year, I went to work at 7 a.m. and got off at 3:30 p.m.

I made decent money, and if I had stayed with it long enough, I could've made good money. There were no breaks besides lunch, and if you had to smoke a cigarette, you had better be able to do it while you worked. From working hard, I was able to end each day with a true sense of accomplishment, seeing progress made as the walls went up.

One interesting thing, though, was every week new masonry tenders were hired, and shortly thereafter, they would quit. Many of these people were roughly my age, maybe a little older or younger.

Now far be it from me to generalize from my brief experience in the blue-collar world, but I see this as being a prime example of one of the harmful trends facing our generation today. No longer are we interested in doing quality work or building things that are going to last.

We now live in primarily a throw-away world. Nothing is meant to last. We have forgotten that for things to be truly good, serious work must be put into making it so. Instead, we are primarily concerned with getting the biggest return for the least effort.

Perhaps due to the excess of the '80s, we figure the road to easy street is going to be reached without hardship. Maybe we see ourselves being given Mercedes and swimming pools by virtue of our being alive.

Now before you start thinking this sounds Republican, let me add there is a big difference between luxuries and necessities. We all need necessities, but this drastic rush to acquire luxuries has harmed society in a big way.

For one thing, it creates outrageous competition within many work places, where the emphasis is not on teamwork, but on who can make it to the top the fastest.

It also adds to an elitist mentality, where those who don't make as much or work jobs seen as being less than desirable, are looked down upon.

How can we expect to progress as a society when our primary consideration is only ourselves?

Numerous things are going wrong in our country today, and if we don't start addressing these issues, a long down-hill slide is all we can expect.

Before we can address these issues, though, we have to come to terms with the fact that we are a team, and if the way you play is to downgrade your teammates, we're heading for a loss.

If we continue to step on the backs of others to get to the top, it is only going to cause less for everyone. This can be seen in the case of large corporations, who in the name of record profits and cheap labor forces, downsize dramatically or move operations out of the country.

We need to take pride in the accomplishments of our teammates and offer help to any who are having problems. To succeed, we need to end elitism and refocus on quality.

The foundations of this nation are crumbling, and it is time to repair it and add on. Let us not try to do this with slipshod methods, but, instead, put the real work necessary into it, so that it rises strong and lasting.

the influence of professors

Instead of finding fault or sharing observations, I want to express gratitude and appreciation.

Having good instructors makes learning not only worthwhile, but somewhat easier. Rather than being forced to accept the entire responsibility for learning on your own, these folks facilitate and guide your learning process along in the right direction, hopefully.

As a senior facing graduation this summer, I can say I have been lucky to learn from some great instructors here at K-State. They rarely get much feedback other than student evaluations, which are hardly objective and can't adequately express how important a classroom experience was for a student. Besides, it's usually well after college when you realize how important those hours spent in class were.

I'd like to recognize some instructors who have helped me become a better human being. While I have disagreed with many of them on issues significant and otherwise, they all had my best interests as a student at heart, and for that, I am grateful.

I also regret the lack of ethnic, racial and gender diversity in this list, but as long as K-State refuses to hire a more diverse faculty, lists like these will continue to be dominated by us white guys.

Here's that list, in alphabetical order.

AMITABHA CHAKRABARTI,
ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR OF PHYSICS

Chakrabarti teaches an Introduction to the Physical World class, which I took. Physics has a lot to do with formulas and math and that sort of thing, of course, but at its heart it is about explaining how the physical world we live in around us works and why.

To that end, Chakrabarti was always using demonstrations of physical phenomena to keep us awake and to teach us. Most of them were comical. When he wasn't using toilet paper to demonstrate inertia, he was cracking jokes about how he hoped not to mess the demonstrations up in that endearing Pakistani accent of his.

JAMES DOYLE,
ASSISTANT PROFESSOR OF PHILOSOPHY

I took Doyle's Introduction to Philosophical Classics class. He's a relatively young guy, which means he understands most people our age read philosophical literature and immediately ask, "So what?"

His youth also helped keep him in touch with current popular trends. When I told him the guitarist for the Seattle rock band Soundgarden has a degree in philosophy from the University of Washington, he actually knew what Soundgarden was and what the philosophy program at UW was like.

He found ways to make the class relevant to us. He appealed to what we already knew and believed to try to get us to understand newer and sometimes puzzling concepts. That's a rare talent.

He's also the funniest and most easy-going person on this list.

MARCIAL ANTONIO RIQUELME, ASSOCIATE PROFESSOR OF
SOCIOLOGY AND DIRECTOR OF
THE LATIN AMERICAN STUDIES PROGRAM

I have several excellent instructors this semester, but in order to avoid the appearance of trying to influence my grades through the editorial page, though, I have decided to choose only one. Riquelme is teaching the Racial and Ethnic Relations in the United States class that I am taking right now.

The class is a diverse bunch, and our class discussions, which Riquelme encourages strongly, are always enriching. But the class is mostly about hard facts and researched data, not opinion and experiences. I've taken more than 40 pages of lecture notes from Riquelme so far, more than I have from any other social science instructor. He also strives to present all sides of the issues for our consideration.

Myview

SCOTT ALLEN
Miller

The reason I singled out Riquelme out of all of the six instructors I have this semester is that Riquelme is such an inspiration. He was jailed in his native Paraguay for his political beliefs and then deported by Paraguay to New York City with no passport or knowledge of English.

In spite of all of this, Riquelme learned English and obtained his masters and doctoral degrees here in the United States. He went on to teach with distinction in several universities and publish his research. He has overcome mountains of adversity to just to teach us here. K-State should be very proud to be associated with this man.

RONALD WEST,
PROFESSOR OF GEOLOGY

Don't take West's oceanography class if you want an easy A or are seeking one of those "just tell me what to study for the test" classes. He hates that, because it's proof to him that you're more interested in your GPA than your education.

He's a tough-minded, opinionated person, which can be threatening until you grow up a little bit. You'll love him, hate him or both, but you won't say he's not brilliant.

Oceanography is an interdisciplinary science, encompassing physics, geology, chemistry and biology into the study of the watery part of our planet. West's emphasis on this aspect of oceanography and how the world's hydrosphere acts in an interconnected, organic way was extremely influential in influencing me to study how the social sciences, especially sociology and political science, are inter-related.

ALDEN WILLIAMS,
PROFESSOR OF POLITICAL SCIENCE

The most important thing I learned in Williams' Introduction to World Politics class was that norms and values are what make the facts in our lives relevant and useful. In his quiet and humble manner, he taught us that cultural, moral, and religious attitudes, not just cold reason and facts, drive decision-making in diplomatic negotiations in Geneva, in the halls of Congress, and even in the grocery store, and that maybe that's not so bad. It seems like a rather simple idea, but we all take it for granted more than we think.

Now you know who has been helpful to me. I suggest you follow my lead and send e-mail or a note to those instructors who have made your experience at K-State a positive one. They will appreciate it.

Scott Allen Miller is a senior in interdisciplinary social science.

► THIS COUNTRY WAS FOUNDED ON RELIGION

Editor,
This letter is in response to Cara Hardage's letter in the April 5 Collegian, "Religion shouldn't matter for candidates." I am responding specifically to the comment stating that separation of church and state is a basic founding principle we should not forget.

The First Amendment was never intended to separate Christian principles from government, schools or any other public arena. But, somehow the phrase "separation of church and state" gets tagged to the First Amendment and the Constitution. The First Amendment to the Constitution states, "Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion or prohibiting the free exercise thereof." The words separation, church or state are not found in the First Amendment, nor is the phrase found anywhere in the Constitution. So, where did the phrase "separation of church and state" come from?

The phrase came from President Jefferson's Jan. 1, 1802, letter to the Danbury Baptists.

The Danbury Baptists had written Jefferson a letter concerning a rumor that the congressionalists' denomination was about to be made the national denomination.

In order to calm their fears, Jefferson wrote them a letter saying, "I contemplate with solemn reverence that act of the whole American people which declared that their legislature should make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof, thus building a wall of separation between Church and State."

He was simply telling them that there was no need to fear the establishment of a national denomination because the wall of the First Amendment would protect the church from government control. Jefferson's view is further established through other statements he made concerning the First Amendment.

But, today all that is heard of Jefferson's letter is the phrase, "a wall of separation between church and state," without either the context, the explanation given in the letter, or its application by earlier courts. The First Amendment was clearly designed to prohibit the establishment of a single denomination. Many rulings and policies were made by the Supreme Court that reflected that interpretation. These rulings and policies are well documented.

Although our founding fathers never intended for church to be excluded from state, through misinterpretations of Jefferson's letter we have passed laws that included making prayer in a school unconstitutional, even if it is both voluntary and denomination-neutral.

Today we make it a point to skip God in not only our schools but in our government as well. George Washington, the father of our nation, warned this nation in his farewell address that to remove religious principles would be to lose national morality. How scary it is to see how accurate his warning is. The United States has become the world leader in violent crime, divorce, teenage pregnancies, abortions and drug abuse.

The founding fathers of our once-great nation delivered us a system of government founded on Christian principles. As stated by Patrick Henry, "It cannot be emphasized too strongly or too often that this great nation was founded, not by religionists, but by Christians; not on religions, but on the gospel of Jesus Christ!" Our founders wanted to have Christians in office, as stated by the first Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, John Jay, appointed by George Washington. He said, "Providence has given to our people the choice of their rulers, and it is the duty as well as the privilege and interest of our Christian nation to select and prefer Christians for their rulers."

If our nation does not see our mistake of cutting out the reason this country exists, Jesus Christ, and put back Christian principles in government, schools and every other public arena, God's judgment will fall upon this ungodly nation.

► ENGLISH-ONLY LAWS RACIST, DISCRIMINATORY, UNNEEDED

Editor,

I am writing to respond to William Thomas Burdette's "English should be official language" column. First of all, Burdette, there is a Senate Bill No. 528, that is pushing the English-only law. This is an act designating English as the official language of the United States.

However, English should not have to be the official language of the United States because it already is the common language of the United States. According to the 1990 census, 95 percent of the residents of this country speak English. It is the language of communication around our country. Why are people afraid of the danger of it disappearing?

It's clear the non-English speaking residents want to learn English, but it's not going to happen overnight. This law isn't suddenly going to make these residents have the incentive to learn English. It takes time and patience. We all know, beyond reasonable doubt, it is essential to speak English if we want to succeed in this country.

English-only laws are unnecessary and racist, and they discriminate. This law also violates Title VII of the Civil Rights Acts. The United States was founded on diversity. English-only laws run counter to this great acceptance.

Anyone who speaks two languages, such as I, is more language proficient. I have been encouraged to maintain my language while learning another. People who know more than one language have more to offer, not less. So why try to make English an official language?

We must learn to rejoice there are people who speak a different language. I intend to continue encouraging my family and friends to be bilingual and not to learn only English.

Burdette, the last paragraph of your column was offensive to me. If you choose to isolate yourself just because you cannot understand another language, why don't you think of taking another language so you too can communicate with this so-called "isolated community?" Furthermore, those non-English speaking residents pay taxes, and that is why voting ballots, drivers license bureaus and other agencies continue to print their texts in other languages.

In conclusion, Burdette's entire column was racist whether you realize it or not.

► COLLEGIAN STAFF NEEDS TO MONITOR AD CONTENT

Editor,

Two recent ads in the Kansas State Collegian by the Scoreboard Sports Bar used these phrases: "Let's get blotto" and "Wet, wild and wasted."

I consider these as encouraging irresponsible drinking of alcoholic beverages and extremely poor judgment by Collegian staff members to publish them.

One irony of the ads is that one appeared in the same issue of the Collegian in which a front-page article described a mock DUI arrest and proceedings — sponsored by Greeks Advocating the Mature Management of Alcohol.

I hope that in the future, Collegian staffers would more carefully monitor the ads they publish.

► LETTER WRITER PASSED BUCK TO GOD

Editor,

Stephanie R. Breaker wrote a letter to the Collegian the other day. This is a response to it and some rambling in general.

In Wednesday's Collegian,

Breaker's letter informed us (among other things) how the nation is in a rut — a rut of "passing the buck." And how does Breaker suggest we get out of this rut? By passing the buck to God.

In her letter, Breaker claims our forefathers would be "outraged at the ignorance of people who throw away the freedom that they so valiantly fought for." I would have to agree with that, to some extent. The founders of this great land fought for a place where people could live their lives as they see fit, where you and I are free to do what is necessary to make ourselves happy (as long as the pursuit of that happiness doesn't infringe upon others). The reasons for their outrage is where our views start to differ.

The outrage of our forefathers would probably stem in many directions, including at a government who wants to have a say in everything we do, in everything we say, in everything we see. The recent attempt to censor the Internet is a prime example of this. At those who want others to live their way, because they believe it to be the "moral" way, what they see as being the right way. Their outrage would be directed at those who try and oppress, at those who try to imply, at leaders throughout the country (doing things for themselves instead of for those they "represent") and at religions. Yes, your religion, too.

"Today is a day of passing the buck," Breaker wrote. I couldn't agree more. Not only are criminals (blaming their society) and way-ward teens (blaming their parents) doing it, but so are those who pray to whatever

God they happen to fancy. Praying to someone for any reason is a form of passing the buck. When your rent is due, when your neighbor's car gets stolen, when little Timmy is sick, when that preacher is molesting kids in his church (if you don't think it happens check out <http://freethought.tamu.edu/org/ftrf/harm.html>), instead of getting on your knees to ask for help, why don't you get off of your lazy butt and do something yourself?

Breaker contends "The healing of a nation will not take place in the political form, but in the individual lives of its citizens."

Again, I couldn't agree more. No one, no thing, no God is going to do anything for you or for anyone. It is your life. You are responsible for your actions. Expecting others to live as you think/feel/believe is crap; when people realize this, then the "healing" will begin.

How many wars have been fought, how many lives have been lost all in the name of your God? I would guess millions. How many wars have been fought, how many lives have been lost in search of personal happiness (the kind that doesn't impede on others)? Accidents aside, I would guess none.

I'm not saying you don't have to believe in your God. No, not at all. It is your life, waste it as you will. This is my point. Your life should be spent doing what makes you happy, if an illogical God does this for you, then by-all-means, pray all you want. But, please, that is between you and it. Keep it that way.

Hawks, Cats to compete at Arrowhead Stadium

On Saturday night, the Kansas City Wiz, Kansas City's new Major League Soccer team, begins the first season in franchise history.

To kick off the festivities, K-State's men's soccer team will take on Kansas at 4:30 p.m. at Arrowhead Stadium.

"KU's soccer club and K-State's soccer club made a proposal to play an exhibition game before their game to increase our publicity in the Kansas City area to the alumni," said Eric Fitzwater, president of K-State's soccer club. "And hopefully someday increase popularity in the sport."

The teams had to sell tickets to the Wiz's game in order to obtain permission to play. The game will be part of the Big 8 soccer tournament, which is in Lawrence on Saturday. The Kansas and K-State teams will travel to Kansas City for their part of the tournament.

Because of a lack of funding, Colorado and Nebraska will not be participating in the final Big 8 Tournament.

"I don't think anybody has played in a 70-80,000-seat stadium before, but it'll be a pretty big deal for everybody that's going to get to play. It's going to be a real fun experience."

fun experience. We've sold 500 tickets for the game. At Arrowhead, we're lucky to get 50 or 75 fans."

Fitzwater said Kansas and K-State are evenly matched, and the competition should be close.

In K-State's only Big 8 competition of the semester, the two teams tied at one. Iowa State and Missouri will be teams that might surprise K-State, Fitzwater said.

"Iowa State and MU are up and down all the time," he said. "We saw the Oklahoma schools and Iowa State last semester but that changes semester to semester."

But that change wasn't so drastic for K-State this semester as it had a good number of players return.

"This semester we had 15-17 players returned, so it was pretty constant," Fitzwater said.

If fans are interested in being part of history, they can watch the Cats in their final Big 8 game and then stay to watch the Wiz in its first game ever.

► TRACK AND FIELD

Tracksters get into swing

Trevor Grimm
staff writer

While the cooler temperatures forecast for this weekend might not have many K-State students thinking about the outdoors, the Wildcat track team will spend its time competing in its fifth outdoor meet of the year when it travels to Wichita for the K.T. Woodman Classic.

Twelve members of the K-State track team will travel to the one-day event. The action begins at 12:30 p.m. with the field events. Track events start at 2:35 p.m.

With the fifth meet of the year, team members are starting to get into the swing of outdoor competition, according to Wanita Dykstra, track team member.

"We were in Louisiana and Baylor, and I just finished indoors. It was like 'outdoors is here already,'" Dykstra said.

"Now we're back in the swing of things and back to normal, I guess."

Saturday's meet is a state meet, and will feature in-state schools such as Kansas, Wichita State, Butler and several junior colleges, Dykstra said.

With the season now several weeks old, things are looking good for K-State.

"From a team point of view, I think we're doing well," Dykstra said.

"We have a lot of freshmen and a lot of transfers. There's been a lot of surprises and some of what we expected."

Several K-Staters have also seen significant improvements from last year, according to Dykstra.

"Everybody's running times are way better than last year, and it's only the beginning of outdoors," Dykstra said.

With the relatively warm early season weather, this meet will give K-Staters another chance to qualify for nationals.

"As long as the weather's good, this is the time you want to look for nationals (qualifying standards)," Dykstra said.

"I got lucky. I qualified early and got it out of the way."

"There's so many people that are just on the bubble of making nationals. And it's good practice for the Big 8."

We were in Louisiana and Baylor, and I just finished indoors. It was like 'outdoors is here already.' Now we're back in the swing of things and back to normal, I guess.

Team hopes to improve 3-2 record in tourney

Shane McCormick
contributing writer

The K-State women's lacrosse team will take to the field this weekend.

The Cats will conduct a tournament at Memorial Stadium on Saturday.

Participating in the tournament will be K-State, Nebraska, Texas Tech and Kansas.

The Cats have produced some success on the field this year. The team will take a 3-2 record into the weekend tournament.

Lacrosse team member Stephanie Weseman, senior in architectural engineering, said the team has already accomplished one of its goals for the season.

"Of course we just wanted to come and have fun, but putting this tournament together was our main goal," Weseman said.

The toughest competition for the Cats should come from the Texas Tech team.

Weseman said Texas Tech has shown a lot of improvement.

"They have gotten a lot better," she said.

"Last year when they played us, they played us pretty evenly."

Currently the Nebraska team is struggling to get enough players to make the trip.

Kansas will be putting its team back on the field for the first time in two years.

Even though this is the first semester of play for the Jayhawks, Weseman said she expects good play from them.

Emily Brink, senior in kinesiology, said the team has not struggled at matches, rather at practice.

"We've really struggled with getting players to be at practices," she said.

"That's been our main problem this year."

"We have to play together as a team," Weseman said.

"Besides that, we're going to have to keep the turnovers low to win."

"If we stay consistent throughout the match and keep our effort level high, we should have some success," Brink said.

Cats ready to fight

Trevor Grimm
staff writer

K-State's baseball team gets another chance to stop its recent skid this weekend when a five-game series with the Nebraska Cornhuskers shifts to Lincoln for the third, fourth and fifth games.

The Huskers are fresh off a two-game sweep in Manhattan, where Nebraska picked up wins of 5-2 and 13-6 on Tuesday and Wednesday. With the losses, K-State dropped to 19-14 overall, 3-7 in the conference. The Wildcats fell to last place in the Big 8, a big turnaround from the season's 5-0 start.

K-State has more important things on its mind than revenge, however. Getting wins any way it can appears to be the team's goal.

"Everybody's just going to get out and give it their best shot," designated hitter David Hendrix said. "If we come back with three wins, we do. If we don't, we need to work harder to get to where we want to be."

"It's just important that we get up there and play well."

K-State has lost four of its last five games and has struggled on offense in the process. If you take away a four-run ninth inning Wednesday after the Cats fell behind by 11, K-State has managed to cross home plate just 11 times in four games. In the two games against the Huskers, the Cats clawed out eight runs on 15 hits, compared to 18 runs and 22 hits from the Huskers.

"I think everybody's just pressing a little bit," Hendrix said. "We just need to relax."

But the struggles have not been limited to offense. Wednesday's starter, Jon Oiseth, was shelled for seven hits and 10 earned runs in a three-inning outing. There were bright spots on the mound, however. After Oiseth left Wednesday's game in the third inning, Nebraska managed just one earned run the rest of the way, but the damage had been done.

While K-State's bullpen could be tired after 8.1 innings of action in the past two games, Nebraska's bullpen should be fresh. Last week's Husker starters pitched 17 of 18 innings, leaving just one inning to the bullpen.

K-State will try to turn things around at 7 p.m. Friday with the first game of a three-game series against the Huskers, who stand at 16-18-1 overall and 5-8 in conference play. The series continues at 2 p.m. Saturday, then closes Sunday with a 1 p.m. matchup.

Things won't get any easier for the Cats if they fall again this weekend. K-State travels to Missouri for a two-game stand next week before returning home for a three-game weekend series against the Oklahoma Sooners.

Despite their recent struggles, the Cats do not appear to have lost confidence.

"We've played well at times and shown that we can be a good ball club at times, but overall we haven't been as consistent as we need to be,"

Hendrix said. "Once we get as consistent as we need to be, people have to watch out."

► SOFTBALL TEAM TO HAVE TOURNEY

The K-State softball team will play in the Manhattan Regents Six Preview Tournament today and Saturday at the Twin Oaks playing fields at Frank Anneberg Park.

The Wildcats will face Fort Scott Community College at 12:30 p.m. on field three, Allen County Community College at 3:45 p.m. on field three and Highland Community College at 8:45 p.m. on field one Friday.

The action will continue at 11:30 p.m. Saturday as the Cats face Neosho Community College on field one and Kansas City Community College at 2:45 on field two.

Rob Levins, assistant coach, said the team hasn't played any of the participants yet this season, but the contest against the Kansas City club should be a competitive one for the Cats.

Arabic remains useful, popular class

AbdullNaser T. Abdullah
 staff reporter

Arabic is the language of the Quran, the holy scriptures of Islam, and the official language in more than 20 countries today. People are learning Arabic everywhere, even at K-State.

"I think Arabic is just a lot more enjoyable language," Scott Kuhn, junior in anthropology, said.

By studying Arabic, one can study a culture also, unlike French and other languages, he said.

"The first semester, I thought, 'well this isn't too bad,'" Kuhn said. Some of the sounds and letters were difficult to pronounce, but it is not the most complex language, he said.

"From what I learned so far, it seems there are less exceptions to the rule than English," Kuhn said.

Kuhn plans to visit the Middle East and have a career in Middle Eastern archaeology.

Sami Halabi, freshman in political science, said he expected Arabic to be much harder than it is. Halabi took Arabic last semester and thought it was easier than English.

"It makes a lot more sense than English," Halabi said.

At K-State, language lab is needed and vital for the learning process, Halabi said. Halabi also intends to work in the Middle East in future.

American students are enthusiastic about studying Arabic, Nabel Ao-Ani, instructor of Arabic, said.

"Many want to know about a different culture," Al-Ani said.

Teaching Arabic is not difficult, he said, but the problem is getting material that can be useful for class. Al-Ani said he would usually find his own material through the Internet or by other means.

Trade show features local businesses

Laurel Novell

Thousands are expected to attend Expo '96, the annual business, home, boat and outdoor show at Bramlage Coliseum and Brandeberry Indoor Complex this weekend.

Manhattan Chamber of Commerce and Manhattan Area Builders Association are sponsoring the event, which is the largest home and business trade show in the area, said Eileen Roufa, membership and programs director for the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce.

The show will be open to the public from 10 a.m. to 6 p.m. Saturday and from noon to 5 p.m. Sunday.

This year's Business Show takes place in Bramlage with more than 80 exhibits featuring products and services for the home.

The Boat and Outdoor Show, on the arena floor in Bramlage, will feature new boats, campers, canoes, personal water craft and motorcycles from seven area dealers, Roufa said.

The Home Show will be in Brandeberry with more than 70 exhibits of products and services for the home, lawn and garden.

Informational seminars will be offered throughout both days by prominent tournament fishermen and water-skiers.

A water-skiing seminar will be at noon and again at 2 p.m. Saturday by the Flint Hills Ski Club and K-State Ski Team, Roufa said.

Chris Ogburn, tournament walleye fisherman; Leonard Jacobs, tournament bass fisherman, and Rick Dykstra, host of the TV show "Goin' Fishin,'" will be conducting seminars at 4 p.m. Saturday and at 1 p.m., 2:30 p.m. and 4 p.m. Sunday, Roufa said.

New to the Expo this year is "Pedal Power," a foot-powered mini-tractor pull for children ages 4-12, at 2 p.m. Saturday in the west parking lot of KSU Stadium.

Winners of the tractor pull will advance to the big Kansas Pull-Off at the Kansas State Fair in Hutchinson in September.

Registration begins at 1 p.m. on Saturday, and there is no cost to participate.

Various prizes and giveaways will occur throughout the weekend, including a color television/videocassette recorder combination to be given away at the Boat and Outdoor Show.

FRIDAY SATURDAY SUNDAY

The welcome mat is out; all K-State is ready for Open House

► MAIN CEREMONIES

Festivities to begin with parade; tours given to visitors

Lynn Wuger
staff reporter

Satisfy your hunger for knowledge today and Saturday during the All-University Open House.

Open House festivities start today with the College of Engineering parade at noon.

"The parade starts Friday on Mid-Campus Drive and will end in the open area between Seaton Hall and the Union," said Karen McVey, office specialist for the dean of engineering.

"The engineering theme this year is 'A World Without Boundaries,' and the floats, which are designed by the different engineering departments, generally focus around the theme."

Following the parade, the College of Engineering will perform the opening ceremonies, which include a torch run, the crowning of St. Pat and St. Patricia, and presentation of the Yellow Brick Award.

"The Yellow Brick Award is presented to the department with the best float in the parade and the most enthusiasm," McVey said.

"We will also be giving tours of the engineering facilities, and student displays will be set up in Seaton Hall from 5:30 to 9 Friday night."

Playing off the theme "Feed Both Sides of Your Brain," Open House events and activities will give visitors and current students an opportunity to discover what K-State has to offer.

"We chose this theme because it was something contemporary and eye-catching," Pat Bosco, dean of student life, said.

"Plus, it gives us a chance to showcase a lot of different academic areas on campus, and it was fun," he said.

Each of the nine colleges, including the College of Technology at K-State-Salina, will be participating in Open House, providing several activities for attendees of all ages.

"We have all of the colleges participating this year with over 200 academic programs and more than 3,000 exhibits, activities and tours throughout the day," Bosco said.

Along with college tours, visitors will be able to check out some of the new additions to campus, as well as coming attractions.

The newly expanded and renovated Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex will be open for tours, and a dedication ceremony for the Bluemont Bell will take place in the courtyard at noon Saturday.

Also, the Farrell Library expansion and renovation project will be on display in the K-State Student Union.

The display will feature a model of the $28 million project and a multimedia presentation of KSU Libraries' new information system.

Saturday's activities and events will operate from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. on the Manhattan campus and from 1 p.m. to 8 p.m. Friday and from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. Saturday at K-State-Salina.

Souvenir programs listing the day's activities, and a campus map will be available at the Union and each of the colleges.

► CAMPUS CONSTRUCTION

Additions to give new look to K-State

Times are a-changin', and so are parts of K-State's campus.

Farrell Library's $28 million addition and renovations projects are predicted to be complete January 1997.

The theme of Farrell's change is "We are Moving into the Future."

They will also be moving into a new building in 1997. The library will feature 153,000 square feet of new space, seating capacity for 2,000 users, 24-hour student study facility with seating for 200, study alcoves with electronic-access availability and electronic library teaching classrooms.

Molly Roysse, social science bibliographer at Farrell Library, said she hopes next year the library will be able to show the entire new section and that construction is currently on schedule.

"When the building is done, it will be a lot easier to navigate than it ever was before," said Rachel Moreland, user-support coordinator of library network services at Farrell Library.

Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art is expected to open September 1996. This building will be 25,000 square feet and will have a commons area, including a bookstore and a small cafe.

Five exhibition spaces will be located in the gallery wing of the $58 million building.

The John Helm Memorial Gallery will show works from the permanent collection. This space honors the founder of K-State's art collection and its guiding spirit for over 40 years, said Bill North, curator of Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art.

Temporary exhibitions taken from the permanent collection will be found in the Mary Holton Seaton Gallery, and traveling exhibitions will be in the Konza Gallery.

Other varieties of exhibitions will be displayed in the Orval Hempler Gallery, while a smaller space is reserved in the Ruth Ann Wefald Gallery for works of art on paper.

The other wing will be the Crosby Kemper Education Wing. It will have the United Missouri Bank Assembly Hall and the LouAnn McKinnon Dunn Activity Center.

► PERFORMANCE

Pianist to raise funds for International Student Center

Khrysti Shell
staff reporter

The energetic strains of Franz Liszt and others will play like a rambunctious child throughout McCain Auditorium when a world-class Canadian pianist takes the stage.

Lucille Chung will give a solo performance at 3 p.m. Saturday to help raise funds for the expansion of the International Student Center. She has arranged for all the proceeds to go to the center.

She was requested to play at the benefit concert by Do Sup Chung, who is a professor in the Department of Biological and Agricultural Engineering here at K-State.

Lucille Chung is his niece. That is the reason why he could approach her and her parents and ask her to perform and help K-State, Do Sup Chung said.

"I think when she was 4 or 5, somehow she asked her mother to buy her a piano," he said.

It was then when she was discovered to have a talent at playing the piano. By the age of 10, she had her first debut with the Montréal Philharmonic Orchestra under the baton of Charles Dutoit.

"She already had been recognized as a child prodigy by Charles Dutoit, and she played with him," Do Sup Chung said.

She finished her master's degree in the Juilliard School of Music in New York City, and afterwards, she went to the Hochschule Für Musik Und Darstellende Kunst "Mozarteum" in Salzburg, Austria, for two years and earned another master's degree there, he said.

During her career, Lucille Chung has won many international awards, including first prize in the Stravinsky Awards International Piano Competition and second prize in the First International "F. Liszt" Piano Competition in Weimar, Germany, and played in well-known places.

She has played in the "Mozarteum," the Amsterdam Concertgebouw, Kennedy Center, Lincoln Center and is scheduled in May to play at Carnegie Hall.

Robert Kruh, co-chairman of the fund-raising committee, said it is a very generous contribution on her part to come and perform in the middle of a very busy concert schedule.

People should come because this is a brilliant, young performer who is probably playing some of the most virtuosic piano music written, Kruh said.

The César Franck that she is playing, as well as the Liszt, are probably some of the most challenging musical literature around and they demand a great deal of energy and rigor in performance and this kind of woman is rather petite, he said.

"I would just simply say that she is a very accomplished artist who is playing a very challenging and difficult and brilliant program," Kruh said.

THE CASUAL CRITICS

by Page Getz and Nolan Schramm

"To Wong Foo, Thanks for Everything, Julie Newmar" Douglas Beane, director

To see Wesley Snipes and Patrick Swayze in miniskirts and high heels almost makes this movie more than mildly entertaining, but not quite.

The beginning drags on so horribly that its strategy seems to be to set up such negative expectations for the rest of it. So negative, in fact, that when it actually picks up it seems better than it would have if it had not been so slow to start.

The movie says a lot about the socially accepted normality of the exploitation and oppression of women, such as that it should not take superheroes in dresses to empower and liberate women.

Still, it is hard to take the movie seriously because of the dense and glitzy nature of the characters.

This is one of those stupid movies, sharing the genre with films like Revenge of the Nerds and Ace Ventura, but it makes the mistake of trying to combine meaning and mindlessness.

Accordingly, the characters are stupid, and the script sets up the actors to be melodramatic and unrealistic.

The movie is not bad, but it is not anything close to good, either. It is just something to wait for on cable when there is nothing else to do.

Nolan:  out of five stars

Setting: the height of a fab drag queen ball in New York. The winner receives a trip to Hollywood for national competition. Miss Noxema (Wesley Snipes) and Miss Vida (Patrick Swayze) win the trip.

They meet the young, naive Chi Chi sobbing outside the green room door, and, feeling sorry for her wretched condition of self-deprecation, invite her to accompany them to Hollywood.

A cameo by Robin Williams gives the film added flair, as if that is needed. He provides the trio with the key to transportation between New York and California.

In a 1970s Cadillac the three set out toward that great sunset on the horizon, blissfully ignorant of the adventure that lies ahead.

A series of adventures lands them in small-town USA with a broken car.

As Chi Chi begins to learn the four steps to becoming a drag queen, Miss Noxema and Miss Vida go on to teach and learn many new lessons in life, ironically providing positive role models for the town.

"The Birdcage"

Mike Nichols, director

Never underestimate the power and relief of an unexpected dose of mindless laughter.

Surprisingly, Robin Williams plays the level-headed half of the couple, and his co-star, Nathan Lane, the "martyr" drag queen, is, with or without the script, a walking punchline.

In an attempt to "butch up" and conceal their tendencies to certain "gay" gestures, the couple's crusade to "straighten" up themselves and their home by ridding it of things like blatantly phallic art is hysterical.

The underlying message in "The Birdcage" seems to be about confronting prejudice by seeing the similarities among people rather than the differences, even if this occurs as a byproduct of the characters' deception.

But the movie is not really entertaining for its moral value; it is just harmlessly damn funny.

If the movie had not been so disarmingly funny and at times hilarious, I would have been more concerned about the possible stereotypes that the movie might reinforce.

The first would be the all-gay-men-are-drag-queens generalization that anyone who was not raised in an outhouse in western Kansas hopefully would not buy into.

The second is that in the movie, Williams plays the more masculine and his partner is the "flamer," which might perpetuate the myth that in gay relationships each partner takes on a different gender role.

Nolan: *1/2 of five stars

The Goldman family consists of two middle-aged homosexual men, living above the nightclub they own.

Their son, Val, is a 20-year-old college student.

The Keeley family is composed of a senator (Gene Hackman), who is leading a committee on moral decency, his homemaker wife and his young daughter, Katharine, a college student.

When the two young ones decide to marry, things get complicated.

Based on the production "La Cage Aux Folles," this comedy/drama centers around the trials facing Albert, a middle-aged homosexual, who makes his living as a celebrity drag queen in a nightclub called the Birdcage.

Robin Williams plays Armand, Val's gay, Jewish father.

Frightened of the possible conflict that could result at the imminent dinner party, Val has his father's home completely upended, taking out all phallic statues, removing all suggestive art and replacing it all with a Gothic surrounding.

Val even goes so far as to suggest the flaming Albert leave the house and plans to invite his biological mother, whom he has never even met.

Meanwhile, the National Enquirer tails the Senator on his drive to Florida, determined to get the scoop on what the senator is up to.

If the family can just pull off a convincing act this one night, everything can go back to normal tomorrow. A hilarious look into the tragedy of brittle attitudes and the "me" generation.

Superb performance by Nathan Lane.

► INDIAN STUDENT ASSOCIATION

Festival offers chance to sample Indian foods

Richea Lecklider
staff reporter

The culture of India can be seen through fashion shows, skits and the taste of Indian foods this weekend. The Indian Students Association will sponsor Utsav, which means festival, at 5 p.m. Saturday at Manhattan Middle School.

"The main purpose of the event is generally to show people what Indian culture is all about and to taste fabulous Indian food," said Roopa Swaminathan, graduate student in journalism and mass communications. Swaminathan said the evening will begin by eating dinner consisting of Indian food. Following dinner, students will perform skits, music and dances they have put together.

"It's an eye-opener to India," Swaminathan said.

The Indian festival takes place twice each year, once in the fall and once in the spring. There are expected to be about 500 people for the spring festival, she said.

► SOCIAL, BEHAVIORAL RESEARCH

Professor discusses work in memory repression

Tom Roesler
staff reporter

The Institute for Social and Behavioral Research has invited a professor of psychology and neuroscience to speak about memory repression. Charles Weaver will speak at 3:30 p.m. Monday in Union 207.

Weaver is a professor and director of the doctoral program in neuroscience at Baylor University who has done extensive research on the way memory works.

Leah Pickett, program coordinator of the Institute of Social and Behavioral Research, said Weaver will be discussing what flashbulb memories can tell scientists about repression of memories and other memory syndromes.

Weaver has done research on what he calls flashbulb memories and said they might be related to the other types of memory syndromes. Flashbulb memories are memories that are remembered because of traumatic events that have happened to a person.

He said there are similarities between flashbulb memories and repression but also differences, such as why flashbulb memories are remembered and repressed memories lead to no memory at all.

Weaver has written several papers about studies done concerning memory in journals such as the Journal of Experimental Psychology and the Journal of Educational Psychology.

Pickett said this topic should be of great interest to anyone interested in learning more about memories.

"With students in psychology, graduate students, faculty and therapist in the community, I think we'll have a full house. It's a topic that has received intense interest," Pickett said.

Union 207 seats about 50 people. Pickett said the location is subject to change if the capacity is reached.

► BANGLADESH SEMINAR

Students celebrate anniversary

Brent Mast
staff reporter

The Bangladesh Student Association will celebrate the 25th anniversary of its country's independence Monday with a seminar featuring a former minister of the government of Bangladesh.

Nurul Islam will speak about his personal experiences as a government official in a relatively new country.

The seminar will be at 4 p.m. Monday in the K-State Student Union Little Theater.

Islam has also served as the deputy chairman for the Planning Commission for the government of Bangladesh and as a professor of economics for the International Food Policy Research Institute.

"It is a big honor for us to have him here at K-State," said Mohammed Shoeb Uddin, secretary of the Bangladesh Student Association.

Islam's experience in government and education make him a particularly knowledgeable speaker in the area of global economics, Uddin said.

"It is important to realize that small countries need the support of the global community in order to compete effectively," Uddin said.

K-State team receives 11th place

■ Team director says he is ecstatic about finishing in top 20 out of 114 schools

Darren Whitley
staff reporter

K-State's forensics team's hopes of making the top 10 fell short during the national tournament at the University of Florida in Gainesville, Fla., last weekend.

The team placed 11th in the nation with Jeni Pruitt, junior in electronic journalism, and Jared Adams, senior in speech, making it to the finals in persuasion and communication analysis, respectively.

"Competition was extremely difficult this year, even for us," Janelle Moore, junior in microbiology, said.

Moore said the level of competition around the nation is high, but not any more difficult than the district K-State competes in during the season.

"I wanted us to be top 10, but any time you are finishing in the top 20 of the 114 schools who competed, that is good. I am ecstatic about it," said Craig Brown, instructor in speech and director of individual events.

Jared Adams, senior in speech, who was the defending national champion in communication analysis, made the finals and placed fourth.

Also making finals, Pruitt placed third in persuasion and 12th overall for making the quarter finals in extemporaneous and communication analysis and semi finals of informative speaking.

During her finals speech, Pruitt used the entire 10 minutes of time allotted and finished exactly on time, she said.

"I had to cut people off, because I was extremely worried about time," Pruitt said.

Her persuasive speech about how college students abuse credit cards was a win-win speech for her before she even gave it, she said. A textbook company buys the finalists' speeches for $200, she said. Brown said the team joked with Pruitt that she would have to buy dinner.

An emerging leader on the team was Pat Broxterman, sophomore in speech, who advanced to the semi finals in the after-dinner speech event.

After-dinner speeches are funny speeches with a persuasive point to them, Brown said.

"Pat had great quarters and dealt very well with the pressure," Brown said.

Brown said Broxterman's competitors predicted he would go clear to finals.

Because the after-dinner speeches tend to be funny, laughter often delays the speaker and causes the speech to run a little longer, Brown said.

"He just went over-time in semi finals. That's the only reason they didn't advance him," Brown said.

The judges allow leeway for laughter, but in this case it was just too much, Brown said.

Brown said next year, the team will cut after-dinner speeches down to give more time for laughter.

"We found the judges liked what we were saying, it was just the performance things and those are actually some of the easier things to fix in the long run," Brown said about what he thinks will make the team stronger next season. "We didn't get blown out of anything," Brown said.

Ten of the 11 students who went to nationals will be returning in the fall, and Brown is expecting two students back who sat out of school this year, he said. "Next year we should be in even better shape. We should be in the top five," Brown said.

Competition was extremely difficult this year, even for us.

► SPRINGDANCE '96

Dances show wide range of methods

Gina Garvin
staff reporter

A colorful variety of different acts will spotlight this weekend's SpringDance.

SpringDance is a repertoire concert in which each dance act is completely separate of one another.

"Each dance is a unique vision of its choreographer," Luke Kahlich, SpringDance production coordinator, said.

Dance acts range from the very funny to the very serious. There are modern pieces as well as a classical ballet act, Kahlich said.

Each dance act is choreographed by a different dance instructor, including Kahlich, Vera Orlock and Joyce Yagerline. Also choreographing one piece each are Nancy Keyser-Shade, guest alumna, and Steve Hoekstra, student choreographer.

Performers in SpringDance auditioned and then were selected to be in the production at the beginning of the semester. The auditions were open to all students, even if they weren't dance majors.

"By having open auditions, we get a wide variety of different people involved," Kahlich said.

After the performers are selected, they are encouraged to take a dance class in order to keep them in shape for the upcoming concert, Kahlich said. Those chosen to dance range from the total beginner to the most advanced student performing in ballet, jazz and modern dance selections.

"I have always loved dance and have wanted to perform in something like SpringDance," Shawna Breathouwer, performer in the classical ballet piece, said.

SpringDance is a concert for all those interested in seeing different dance pieces that they may have not had the opportunity to see before.

"If you haven't been to anything like this before, it's definitely a learning experience," Breathouwer said.

K-State researches, approves vacuuming for killing bacteria

Tom Roesler
staff reporter

A process developed to kill more than 90 percent of bacteria on beef carcasses has been researched and approved for the beef market at K-State.

Steam vacuuming is a process of centralized cleaning of a contaminated area on the carcasses of the animal after slaughter.

"It's kind of similar to a home carpet cleaner," said Randy Phebus, assistant professor of food microbiologies in animal science and industry.

Steam vacuuming is a process of using a vacuum to clean an area on the beef where steam was used to sterilize the nozzle and the contaminated surface.

Knife trimming was used before steam vacuuming was developed. With the old process, a knife was used to cut away the contaminated area. Because of the actual cutting away of meat, Phebus said steam vacuuming is better.

"It's much better in terms of yield, because with knife trimming, you're cutting off meat. With steam vacuuming, you're not cutting off any meat," Phebus said.

The research and testing for steam vacuuming was performed at K-State. Phebus, Dave Schafer, K-State extension specialist, and doctoral student Abbey Nutsch tested the effectiveness of the process and found a very high success rate.

"We inoculated high levels of pathogens on the carcasses and were removing 90 percent of what we put on," Phebus said.

Another process that was researched at K-State but works on a different principle is steam pasteurization.

In this process, the entire carcass is sprayed with steam. The temperature of the beef rises to nearly 200 degrees. This kills bacteria in the whole body, not just centralized areas.

"In steam vacuuming, you only do a small, confined area. With steam pasteurization, the whole carcass is steamed right before it goes in the holding cooler," Phebus said.

Phebus said even though none of the processes are perfect, they are all effective ways to ensure the safety of the meat.

"No one process can absolutely ensure entire safety. The more hurdles you throw in, theoretically, the better your processes will be," Phebus said.

Phebus, Schafer and Nutsch have compared knife trimming, steam vacuuming and steam pasteurization and found although steam pasteurization is slightly more consistent, the combination of the three processes is the most effective way to produce safe products.

MACKAY

"It is a creative way to keep in touch with people," Mackay said. There is no relationship between creativity and IQ, he said.

"Put some fun and creativity into your life," he said. "If you give me a dollar and I give you a dollar, we each have a dollar, but if you give me an idea and I give you an idea, we each have two ideas."

The "Harvey Mackay Rolodex Network Builder" was distributed to the audience at the beginning of the lecture. Mackay urged people to make good use of the book and what it contains.

Thinking is the most valuable thing people have, he said. People must set themselves clear goals to go out and achieve, he said.

"A goal is a dream with a deadline," he said. People who set themselves clear goals are found to be more successful in achieving them than those who do not, he said.

Mackay also talked about teamwork and communication.

Communication is the key to success in business, he said. With good communication, employees know what to expect from their employers and work harder as a team, he said.

Teamwork is a collection of diverse people who are committed to each other's success, Mackay said.

Commitment to yourself is also important, he said. Mackay learned he had cancer three years ago. Early detection allowed the doctors to successfully get rid of the cancer.

It does not matter how well you take care of your employees if you do not take care of yourself, he said.

Mackay was praised by President Jon Wefald for providing copies of "Sharkproof" free for students at the speech.

Mackay's "Swim With The Sharks Without Being Eaten Alive" has been translated into 35 languages and sold in more than 80 countries. Mackay said he chose titles with sharks in them to surprise people. Not many business book titles are this surprising, he said.

His Rolodex file helped him get a few endorsements for his books, Mackay said.

Mackay mentioned that his yet-to-be released book is named "Dig Your Well Before You're Thirsty." It is going to be about networking, he said.

Mackay is heading to Boston to participate in the Boston Marathon on Monday.

Arabic, too, Al-Ani said.

These study Arabic to be able to read the Quran and understand it better, he said.

American students in the Arabic class can be divided into three groups, Al-Ani said.

Group one takes an Arabic class as an elective; group two are Arab people born in the United States and wanting to get a feel of their language; and group three are those who intend to have careers in the Middle East or are married to people from the Middle East and would return there in future, Al-Ani said.

The Arabic language program has been offered at K-State since fall 1984. Two classes are offered each semester.

STRECKER GALLERY

Realist explores spiritual aspects, earthiness in work

Russell Fortmeyer
contributing writer

The artist Dean Mitchell doesn't dream of "making it" in New York City. He's perfectly content working out of his Overland Park home and studio, where he's been producing realist art since 1984. He previously worked for Hallmark Cards from 1980 to 1984.

"There used to be ambition to make it in New York, but I'm not that hung up with it anymore," Mitchell said. Mitchell said most art collectors in Kansas City usually collect artists who exhibit in New York.

"New York people don't care if you've shown in New York," he said. "If it's good art, they'll buy it."

A one-person show of his newest works comprises a show opening at 5 p.m. tonight Strecker Gallery — his first one-man show at Strecker since 1994. Mitchell will be present.

Strecker is the only gallery in Kansas that shows his work. He also shows in Aspen, Jackson, Miss.; Scottsdale, Ariz., and Park City, Utah — not to mention many juried exhibits, various other galleries, and invitational exhibits.

It's almost an understatement in the local arts community to say Mitchell's work is popular. He is, perhaps, the most beloved regional artist in the Kansas area.

Why do Manhattan culturatti warm to Mitchell's work?

"Some of it is very real to them," Mitchell said. "Cutting edge art is so far out, people don't relate to it." "I try to bring a spiritual aspect to my work, and people crave that," he said. "There is serious honesty in it."

"I grew up in a rural area and worked on a farm," Mitchell said. "My work is raw, earthy and real. It's what I grew up around."

Mitchell's work, a diverse mixture of portraits, urban landscapes and various genre scenes, is mainly created with watercolor, although he still uses some oils. He began as an artist with oils, but he has found much success with his masterful technique in watercolors.

His portraits of old homes, friends, family and a series of Kansas City Renaissance Festival characters are delicate watercolors that easily draw comparison to another great realist artist (and recent subject of a big retrospective at the Nelson-Atkins), Andrew Wyeth.

Most recently, Mitchell painted the series of U.S. postage stamps honoring jazz musicians.

"My work is always changing," Mitchell said. "Wyeth never really ventured out or changed. He approached his work the same way his entire career."

Mitchell, an African American, has faced obstacles in the art world.

"When I was younger, galleries wouldn't show my work because they were scared I would run off the clientele," Mitchell said.

Mitchell said there is a discrepancy in the art market as to the money a white artist can demand for a work and what an artist of color can.

Mitchell said the farmers' union conceded the legislation did need some improvements, but now it needs to be reworked completely. "Next year when the president plans to introduce new legislation, we are planning to work with him," Mitchell said.

A spokesperson for Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., said the signing of the farm bill heralds a new era in American agriculture.

"The Republican Congress kept its promise by delivering a historic bill which overhauls 60 years of outdated agriculture policy and transitions America's farmers into the 21st century," Dole's spokesperson said.

The spokesperson said instead of mandates and the heavy hand of government, farmers are provided with incentives to promote common-sense conservation practices, making this a bill conservationists can be proud of.

The president said the hallmark of the bill is the planting flexibility provisions.

Farmers will be free to plant for the market, not for government programs.

"The expansion of planting flexibility will improve U.S. competitiveness in world markets," Clinton said.

The president was also pleased the bill ad-resses the concerns and importance of rural development.

Clinton said Congress has incorporated the administration's principle that the United States must continue its investment in traditional infrastructure while expanding the investment in information infrastructure and in human capital.

"These investments will ensure that all Americans, regardless of how remote an area they live in, will have the opportunity to better their lives and share in the economic growth spurred by the revolution in information technology," Clinton said.

The president said he is most disappointed Congress has rolled back an important reform of the crop insurance program, which was enacted just 18 months ago, to ensure every farmer has crop insurance where it is available.

Gary Hall, Kansas Farm Bureau president, said the new farm bill is environmentally responsible.

The bill extends a successful conservation reserve program that ensures 36.4 million acres will be maintained in CRP and continues conservation compliance.

"We believe this farm bill is the best deal for us at this time," Hall said.

Frank Miller, Riley County farmer, said it is welfare for bigger farmers, and it will have very little benefit to small farmers.

"It makes big farmers bigger, kicks smaller farmers out," Miller said.

As far as crop insurance, Miller said he has had to depend on it, most recently after the floods of 1993.

"I was flooded out completely," Miller said.

"The insurance which I signed for paid me less than what a new crop would, so I planted a new crop of wheat in part of the cattle pasture," he said.

If there would be another natural disaster, Miller said the crop insurance would do him nothing.

"The insurance they've got would not mean much," he said.

In addition, the Farm Bill would provide $1 billion over seven years for on-farm conservation measures, including assistance for livestock producers, which will help prevent soil erosion and clear streams and air.

The bill also would provide $200 million, with the possibility of an extra $150 million for restoration of the Everglades.

"This project is one of the administration's top environmental priorities," Clinton said.

Clinton said the funds in this bill are a good down payment toward their goal.

"This farm bill is good for agriculture, good for taxpayers, good for the environment and good for America," Dole's spokesperson said.

"No doubt about it, Republican leadership has produced a solid foundation for a prosperous rural America," Clinton said.

Some colleges had more voters than others. From the College of Engineering almost 800 students voted. This was the highest turnout of any of the colleges.

"Engineering really helped out Hansen," Schneider said.

Other colleges had lower turnouts than previous years.

"Arts and sciences was way down from last year. There was 1,100 voters last year, and maybe 700 to 800 this year," Schneider said.

Still, the candidates aren't to blame, Schneider said.

"I think most of the candidates did a pretty good job. The president tried pretty hard. There was a lot of apathy." In the K-State Student Union, the polls were located downstairs.

Last year it was located on the upper level of the Union. Schneider said this change wasn't the reason students didn't vote.

The Elections Committee is considering changes for next year.

"We're trying to get it on computer," Schneider said.

April 13 is the official national MS Walk Day.

As many as 400 cities will sponsor MS walks across the country. Three hundred thousand people are expected to participate nationwide, Smitschyn said. It's not too late to get involved.

"Pledges are required to participate, but no minimum amount is required," Everett said.

The deadline for turning in pledge money is May 10, so walkers can continue to collect pledges after the walk.

Everett got involved with the MS walk after her mom was diagnosed.

After moving to K-State she called the MS Society and got involved as a co-chairman of the walk last year.

MS is a neurological disease that attacks the nervous system.

There is no known cause or cure.

It strikes people typically between the ages of 20 and 40 and is more likely to strike women.

SENATE

The amount will be increased from $60,129 to $69,148. Aaron Truax, college council coordinator, thanked senators for the increase.

"I've talked to my college council, and I'm sure a bunch of you have talked to yours, I hope at least. It's kinda a thing we need to do. It was a major concern earlier in the year when I was on the cabinet as associate college council coordinator is the struggle for money, money, money, money. This (the bill) enables them to get more money," Paul Colwell, education senator, said.

Two other bills were passed. One bill set the fiscal year 1998 budget for the student health fee and the other set the date of review for the student publications operations fee prior to the 1998-99 academic year.

Two commendations were moved into special orders to be approved before next Thursday. One commendation is for Student Body President Jeff Peterson and Vice President Brad Finkeldei. The other commendation is for Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life, who will be leaving K-State after new student orientation.

MITCHELL

and what an artist of color can.

"In the early 1980s, Bill Cosby gave $250,000 for a Henry Tanner work, when a Jasper Johns sells for $17 million — and he's living," he said. "Even when they are dead, the prices aren't even close. It undermines the whole market for artists of color."

Mitchell said his portraits of African Americans are a lot harder to sell than his other work.

"With self-expression, you run into social barriers," he said. "My portraits of Renaissance artists — they're white — sell."

Mitchell said he is trying to work to make changes for artists of color in the market.

Mitchell's work's price tag has increased over the past three years, with some oil paintings at his 1994 show priced around $40,000. That's a pitance compared to a Julian Schnabel or a Wyeth — both white artists who fetch well into the six-figures.

To increase an artist's prestige, and therefore their fetching value, a museum show can open up an artist's work to a new audience and a wider media. The Strecker show is actually a bit of a preview for the October 1996 retrospective at the new, as-yet-opened Marianna Kistler Beach Museum of Art on campus.

"It's a big step for me," Mitchell said. "I'm hoping it will break open some doors. It's a daring thing for the museum to do and will surely bring recognition to the University."

Mitchell said museums don't look for realist artists, but are more interested in experimental art and the next trend.

"It has some validity to it, but it does create some confusion with the public," he said. "It's gotten so ridiculous the general public doesn't know what art is."

Manhattan will never be the center of culture Manhattan, N.Y., considers itself, but New York will never have Dean Mitchell, either.

CHESTER E. PETERS RECREATION COMPLEX APPRECIATION AND RE-DEDICATION/TRIBUTE

The Recreational Services Council has decided to deviate from the traditional formal ceremony normally held for dedication/re-dedication and use the Collegian to honor and thank people.

CHESTER E. PETERS RECREATION COMPLEX FUNDED BY

AT KANSAS STATE UNIVERSITY

ORIGINAL BUILDING
Referendum: February 1976
Building opened: October 3, 1980

DEDICATED/NAMED IN HONOR:
Dr. Chester E. Peters
April 1985

EXPANSION/RENOVATION: Referendum: November 1991
Project completed: Fall 1995

First and foremost, a very special thanks to the Kansas State University students who should be proud of their contribution and commitment to quality, recreational sport and fitness facilities with the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. A plaque (represented at left) will be displayed at the Rec Complex to honor that commitment.

There are so many individuals to thank for their dedication and leadership that brought the expansion from dream to reality. Recreational Services Council leadership by Derek Nelson, Chair 1990-91; Kerry Delay, Chair 1991-92; leadership by Student Body Presidents: Todd Johnson 1989-90, Todd Heitschmidt 1990-91, and Jackie McClasky 1991-92; Student Senators, Recreational Services Council members; and many many other students. Thanks also go to all the administration who helped support this project: President John Wefald; Vice President for Institutional Advancement Bob Krause; Associate Vice President for Institutional Advancement Pat Bosco, Vice President for Administration and Finance Tom Rawson and his staff; and individuals from the Facilities Planning office, including Jerry Carter, Director, and Skyler Harper, project manager, as well as the State Architect's staff.

Special thanks to the architects, the Ken Ebert Design Group, including Ken Ebert, Mike Mayo, Rob Westberg, Migette Kaup, and all the others for a great design. Thanks to the general contractor, Coonrod and Associates, with Randy Coonrod, Jack and Patty Austin, the sub contractors, and all their individuals that were such a great group of people to work with.

Thanks to all the students, other participants, and Rec Services staff who endured the hardships of rerouting, dust, noise, and other inconveniences during the construction process. Thanks to the custodians - Almajeon Birdsong, Clyde Flemmer, Robert Mattson, and Tae Janzen who worked even harder during the construction project to keep courts and other areas as clean as possible daily for all the participants. Thanks to all the students, student architects, faculty, staff, administration, and alumni who had ideas and gave advice that helped contribute to an outstanding facility.

A special thanks to the Recreational Services staff who scheduled and rescheduled, who brainstormed, who searched and researched, who surveyed, who moved and moved again, who withstood many inconveniences, all with a smile and positive attitude knowing that more and better facilities were coming.

We re-dedicate the expanded facility and pay tribute to the late Chester E. Peters. The following tribute will be displayed as a photo plaque in the building in his honor.

CHESTER E. PETERS

October 15, 1922-October 1, 1995

Chester E. "Chet" Peters was the only individual at Kansas State University to hold the office of Vice President of Student Affairs. He was a native of Minneapolis, Kansas, and a graduate of Valley Falls High School. Peters came to Kansas State as a business student in 1940, went on to letter in football and track, and was a member of several honorary societies. He graduated cum laude in 1947 with a bachelor of science degree after temporarily serving overseas in World War II, advancing from private to captain. He completed his master of science degree from K-State in economics and agricultural economics in 1950. He then received his doctorate in economics, agricultural economics, and administration from the University of Wisconsin in 1953.

Dr. Peters began his career at K-State in 1953 as the assistant dean of the College of Arts and Sciences. He established the first Career Planning and Placement Center on campus. During his tenure Peters gained the admiration and respect of countless K-State students through his regular administrative duties and numerous hours with Student Government, Blue Key National Honor Society, Athletic Council, Housing Council, Council on Student Affairs, Student Loan Committee, scholarship committees, and the Intramural Council.

In 1983 the Chester E. Peters Lecture Series in Student Development was begun in cooperation with the College of Education in recognition of students and the student personnel profession. Blue Key established the Chester E. Peters Scholarship for Student Development in his honor.

Dr. Peters was instrumental in obtaining approval for the construction of this building, which would later be named in his honor. Construction was funded by a student-sponsored bond issue in February of 1976. Ground breaking took place on January 26, 1979, and the doors opened to the university community on October 3, 1980. The building was dedicated and named in his honor as the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex on April 27, 1985, preceding his retirement as Vice President of Student Affairs on July 1, 1985.

In November of 1991 students voted to expand and renovate the original building, again with student money, and the project was completed in late 1995. Unfortunately, Dr. Peters' untimely death did not allow him to utilize the completed building; he and his wife Doris were fitness advocates and frequent users of the track.
